LINDLEY, M.R.—It is unnecessary to say whether the decision in that case was right or wrong, and I express no opinion upon it; but it was a totally different case from this, and the ground on which I wish to put my judgment is this: that this Court will not compel a man to buy a property which, if he takes no steps to prevent it, will expose him, as owner, to criminal proceedings by reason of its state at the time of the sale. If he knows or ought to know the state of the property, that proposition may not apply; but to force that position upon an innocent purchaser would be wrong.—p. 260.

BLACKBURN, J.—It is a most important rule that where there is a contract in writing, it should not be added to if the written contract is intended to be the record of all the terms agreed upon between the parties; where there is a collateral contract the written contract does not contain the whole of the terms. As to the cases which have been cited, I should decide Morgan v. Griffith (L. R. 6 Ex. 70) the same way; the decision in Mann v. Nunn I am inclined to think wrong, but it is unnecessary to say how that may be.

LUSH, J.—I quite feel, in deciding as we do, we are going counter to Hodgson v. Johnson. There the defendant, tenant of a brickyard, agreed verbally with the plaintiff that the plaintiff should go into possession taking the plant and bricks at a valuation, and the defendant was to pay the rent due from him. It was held that the plaintiff, though he had gone into possession, and had his goods sold under a distress, could not recover under the agreement to pay the rent, as it was not in writing. But the only point taken before the Court was whether the agreement to take the bricks could be severed from the agreement as to the occupation. It is strange that the Court seems to have overlooked the fact that, quite independently of the agreement to transfer the lease, the circumstances of the case originated a claim for compensation. If the point were to arise again, I am inclined to think that the decision would not be followed.—p. 290.

WILLES, J.—Lord Mansfield only intended to decide that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover a large sum which he had expended before he obtained the lease, and not to decide that the lessor was not bound to grant a valid lease. Law-momentous one, and advised a settlement. The Court, therefore, certainly did not think it was decided by Gwillim v. Stone.—p. 379.

KAY, L.J. (for the Court).—The case of Stranks v. St. John was referred to, in which there was an agreement in writing to let for seven years. This by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, could not be a lease for seven years, because it was not by deed. It was, therefore, treated as an agreement to grant a lease by deed, under which the intended lessee would be entitled to investigate the lessor's title if he had not waived that right. The action seems to have been brought by the lessee on an implied contract to make a good title, the breach alleged being that the lessor never had any right or title to let for the term. Mr. Justice Willes said in his judgment that a lease for years is really only a sale of land for that period, and all sales of land imply a stipulation that the vendor has a good title. But it is clear law that no action will lie against a vendor for damages for contracting to sell land to which he has not a good title.—Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Bl. 1078); Bain v. Fothergill (43 L. J. Ex. 243; L. R. 7 H. L. 158)—except perhaps to recover the expenses to which the purchaser has been put in investigating such title. The case was tried on demurrer, and is not of any value in the present discussion.—p. 683.

ESHER, M.R.—But it is suggested that there are cases to show that, if equity would decree specific performance of the agreement, the case must be treated in all Courts as if such a decree had been made, so that the equitable is converted into a common law debt. Some of the words used by Sir George Jessel in Walsh v. Lonsdale are capable of that construction; but the ground of the decision is that, since the Judicature Act, there is only one Court, and that equity rules prevail in it. The M.R. was speaking of a Court that could give relief by decreeing specific performance because the equity rules prevail. In the same way, Cotton, L.J. in Lowther v. Heaver . . . was directing his remarks to a Court in which specific performance could be decreed. There is another case which bears on this matter: Swain v. Ayres. . . The equitable doctrine, as to the effect of an agreement for a lease, was there also confined to cases in the High Court, and the decision does not go the length of saying that it should apply in any other Court. These decisions do not apply to such a case as this in the County Court, and that Court had no equitable jurisdiction in the matter.—p. 257.

BRAMWELL, B.—With the greatest respect for presume that parties, who expressed themselves as agreeing to lease, intended to work an actual demise, because there was no inconvenience attendant upon their doing so; but after the statute passed that reasoning became impossible. The Court of Common Pleas, however, held that the same reasoning applied, and I, with great respect, believe that exception may be taken to that decision.—p. 609.

ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (for the Court).—The only case on the subject which has yet been decided in a Court of common law is the case of Cooke v. Booth, which is certainly a case very analogous to the present, both in respect of the words of covenant on which the claim to perpetual renewal is founded and also in respect of the fact of successive renewals of a lease similar in terms with the one claimed. In that case, however, the series of successive renewals from the first downwards was uniform and unbroken; in this case it is only alleged that the covenants correspond with those in various other leases successively made, which allegations as to various other leases might be true, although there should have been several instances to the contrary. The case was decided upon two grounds: first, that the parties themselves had by successive renewals of the lease, in all of which the covenants of renewal had been uniformly repeated in the same terms, put their own construction upon this covenant, and upon this first ground the judgment of Lord Mansfield, Willes, J. and Ashurst, J. proceeded. The second ground (and on this the judgment of Buller, J. proceeded) was that the authority of Bridges v. Itchcock (1 Bro. P. C. 522) decided the case then in question. As to the first of these grounds, inasmuch as the fact stated respecting the successive renewals is so materially different in this case from the statement in Cooke v. Booth, this case cannot be governed thereby, even if it were competent "in any form of action to bring upon the record the fact with reference to the former leases as explaining the contract contained in the last lease." Upon which point very grave and serious doubts have been entertained, and which it is not now necessary to decide.—p. 244.

PEARSON, J.—But looking at the case of Lennon v. Napper, I am of opinion that the passage which I have just read [on p. 635, from "The meaning of the parties" down to "only object"] must be held to apply to the practice of the Court in Ireland with regard to the renewal of leases—a practice which, at the time when Lord Redesdale delivered his judgment, had been, I think I am not wrong in stating, so-wild that the legislature thought it right to restrain it by an Act of Parliament, which was professedly passed for the purpose of stating under what circumstances only leases might be renewed, and, in fact, so far as I understand it, limiting the power which the Irish Court of Chancery had exercised formerly of granting indiscriminately renewal of leases, when the time within which they ought properly to have been renewed had elapsed (p. 196). . . . But I do not feel myself justified by what I believe to have been the practice and the decisions of this Court to adopt Lord Redesdale's views.—p. 197.

BRETT, L.J.—... We think it may be considered as settled that the principle of that case can only be applied where, as, indeed, was the fact in Cosser v. Collinge the defendant had a fair opportunity of ascertaining for himself the provisions of the original lease: see Grosvenor v. Green (28 L. J. Ch. 173) and Smith v. Capron (19 L. J. Ch. 322). In the present case there was no such fair opportunity before the copy lease was sent to the defendant's solicitor.—p. 127.

BRETT, L.J.—Kuscl v. Watson is not in point here, because there, beyond all doubt, there was an express agreement for a lease of which specific performance could be granted. I do not express an opinion whether the decision in Re King's Leasehold Estates was right or wrong, but I must say that in my view Vice-Chancellor Malins did not truly interpret what was said by Lord Eldon in Browne v. Warner.—p. 129.

ALDERSON, J.—If this case depended on the principle said to have been laid down by Lord Tenterden in Freeman v. Jewry, I should pause before I gave it my assent. But it is not necessary to decide that point; for though under some circumstances a man may become tenant by act of law, the lessor may afterwards accept another tenant in his stead.—p. 174.

CROMPTON, J.—In this case it was considered that a tenancy from year to year recommenced every year; but the contrary was held in Doe d. Ingh v. Wood (14 M. & W. 682; 15 L. J. Ex. 41). . . . Though some doubts may once have existed as to whether, in the case of a tenancy from year to year, there was a fresh tenancy at the end of each year, it is now clear beyond all doubt that the same tenancy continues till the one or other of the parties determines it at his pleasure: and the same principle must apply to any shorter tenancy, as from week to week.—p. 164.

 CHANNELL, J.—It is not necessary to express a definite opinion now as to whether the passage which has been cited from the judgment of the P. C. in Day v. Day is good law, and whether it is consistent with the judgment of the Ex. Ch. in Turner v. Doe d. Bennett (9 M. & W. 643; 11 L. J. Ex. 453). I will only say that I am not myself clear that the passage is well founded. It seems to me that when a definite acknowledgment has been obtained from the tenant that he is holding with the owner's permission, it is all that is wanted.—p. 683.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—All that was decided in Fitzgerald v. Portarlington (Lord) was that the tenant had an equity to have the ejectment restrained, he being ready and willing to carry out the substituted agreement. . . . What you have here is not an agreement for a new tenancy, but a collateral agreement to accept payment of rent at a reduced rate if paid at the proper times, and it has not been paid at the proper times. The consequence of that is, that the right to the rent reserved under the lease remains unaffected, and also the right of distress incident to such rent.—p. 642.

Brett v. Rolph (1845) 14 M. & W. 348; 14 L. J. Ex. 308.—EX.

PARKE, B.—The case of Poulteney v. Holmes is certainly a very doubtful authority. If this objection could be cured there ought not to be a new trial; and it might be cured if Poulteney v. Holmes be good law; but it is very questionable whether that case be good law, especially since the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Parmenter v. Webber (8 Taunt. 593). It is very difficult to say that, because an agreement is by parol, and therefore cannot operate as an assignment, it is to be construed to give a less interval than the parties intended. I think that doctrine cannot be sustained, and therefore that, if the plaintiff went down to a new trial, there would be a verdict against her.—p. 352.

[The question in the case was whether an underlease for the whole of the residue of the original term necessarily amounts to an assignment, and it was argued that in Pollock v. Stacey it was held that the relation of landlord and tenant may be created by a lease of all the lessor's interest.]

BOVILL, C.J.—No doubt the question was sought to be in some degree raised in Pollock v. Stacey, but there the action was brought for use and occupation, and it was not necessary that there should have been any actual demise or assignment. The only question was whether the person in occupation was liable to payment. There was no deed in that case which could act as an assignment, and the Court say, "the parties intended to contract the relation of landlord and tenant. This they were at liberty to do by law; and we therefore carry their lawful intentions into effect." The case was decided on its special circumstances and is no authority in support of Mr. Pollock's contention.

Churchward v. Ford (1857) 26 L. J. Ex. 354; 2 H. & N. 446; 5 W. R. 831.—EX.

BRAMWELL, B.—In Hellier v. Sillico (infra) the Court thought that the occupation was by permission of the plaintiff. In Standen v. Christmas there had not only been a notice to pay rent to the plaintiff, but the defendant had afterwards paid rent to him; and the Court were in error in saying that to give the action for use and occupation the relation of landlord and tenant need not subsist between the parties. The word "landlord" implies not the mere lordship or ownership of the soil, but the relationship to a tenant; and in Webster's Dictionary a landlord is defined to be a person who has tenants under him. And so in Johnson's Dictionary.—p. 356.

LUSH, J. (for the Court).—Doe v. Goldwin was cited, where Lord Denman, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, laid it down that a mortgagor, who had mortgaged subsequently to the demise to the defendant, could not give a notice to quit in his own name; the case, however, did not call for a decision upon that point. . . .

This dictum had been adopted in the text-books as an authority for the proposition that a notice by an agent is bad if it does not state that it is given by authority, or in the name of the principal,—a proposition we think too general, and which requires the qualification we have adverted to.—p. 572.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree . . . with the rule laid down by Bayley, J. in Doe v. Culliford, that we must look at the intention of the landlord, and that when language is used which leaves the effect of the notice open to doubt, the rule of construction is to make it sensible and not insensible. In Doe v. Morphet, however, Doe v. Culliford was treated as bad law, and the principles of construction laid down in the judgment of Bayley, J. were said to be incorrect. I cannot agree with that. As it seems to me the judgment of Bayley, J. in Doe v. Culliford was quite right, and I can find nothing in the principles of inter-

Gardner v. Ingram (1889) 61 L. T. 729; 54 J. P. 311.—COLERIDGE, C.J. and BOWEN, L.J. COLERIDGE, C.J.—Mr. Cross relied on Thompson v. Maberly, where Lord Ellenborough, C.J. stated that if premises are taken for "twelve months certain and six months' notice to quit afterwards," the tenancy may be determined by a six months' notice to quit expiring at the end of the first year. That case is not, however, quite satisfactory, as it appears to have been decided on the meaning of the word "certain," and as Lord Campbell points out in a note, the decision was for the plaintiff on another point, so that Lord Ellenborough's observation was obiter. It is true that in Brown v. Symons (supra) in the C. B., which was an apprenticeship case and turned upon the words "for twelve months certain," Thompson v. Maberly was cited in the argument, and was not disapproved of. But I think that in a case of a similar agreement where the word "certain" does not occur, it would be very doubtful whether Thompson v. Maberly should be treated as an authority.—p. 730.

RIGBY, L.J.—Two authorities were cited in support of the respondent's contention [that a clause in an agreement for a lease providing that the tenancy may be determined by a three notice was to be sufficient, and I feel a difficulty in following the argument in these cases. It seems to have been to the effect that, the tenancy being a tenancy from year to year, it followed that, whether the parties agreed to the contrary or not, it could only be put an end to by such a notice as the law ordinarily requires in the case of such a tenancy, and the parties could not vary the character of the notice requisite by agreement. In Doe d. King v. Grafton, Lord Campbell used certain expressions upon which the respondent's counsel relied, but they appear to me to be merely obiter dicta; and on the other hand there is In re Threlfall, by which we are bound as being a decision of the Court of Appeal. It was there laid down that the parties to a tenancy from year to year may agree to any terms they like with regard to the notice to quit. It was attempted to distinguish that case from the present on the ground that there a tenancy from year to year was expressly mentioned, but I do not think that constitutes any valid distinction. It is a clear authority that a stipulation for a three months' notice to quit is not inconsistent with a yearly tenancy.

BUCKLEY, J.—I do not . . . read the decision of the Appeal Court in Horsely Estate, Ltd. v. Steiger as being in conflict with the decision in Lock v. Pearce ([1893] 2 Ch. 271), which is not cited in Horsely Estate, Ltd. v. Steiger. It appears to me that the decision of the Appeal Court in the last-mentioned case comes only to this, and can be supported entirely only upon this—that having regard to the very short time allowed between the notice and the commencement of the proceedings, the proceedings on the notice were bad; not necessarily that the notice itself was bad.—p. 503.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I see a distinction (whether well founded or not) between this case and Walrond v. Hawkins. The covenant in that case was that the lessee was not to assign or demise or to permit any other person to occupy the premises or any part thereof without the consent of the lessor. What the Court of Common Pleas said was this: "What the lessee has done is a demise, and it is a breach of the covenant not to demise, but the lessor has elected not to treat it as a breach of forfeiture, and he cannot say also that the lessee has broken the other covenant that he would not permit any other person to occupy." That decision seems to me not applicable to the present case. Here there is no covenant not to demise, but a covenant that the lessee will not permit the use of the premises in a particular way.—p. 262.

WILLES, J.—It has been contended on the part of the plaintiff, that the bringing an action of ejectment was such an election on the part of the landlord to take advantage of the forfeiture, and put an end to the term, as to prevent the subsequent acceptance of the rent from operating to revive the lease, and that that view is sustained by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Jones v. Carter. I am glad we are not bound to lay down so capricious a doctrine as that, although the bringing an action of ejectment is an unequivocal demonstration of intention on the part substantial distinction between an action of ejectment for the recovery of land, and an action to recover rent, and none such has been pointed out.—p. 386.

WILLES, J.—I am not prepared to shake that [the above] decision. There was no equivocation, as has been contended about the action, for it was a distinct assertion of every reason on which the plaintiff could rely; and, indeed, even if a man gives a bad reason, he may afterwards rely on any good one, as was laid down by Lord Holt in *Greenhill v. SMITH, L.J.—It is said, however, that this case [Brewer v. Eaton] was overruled by the Court of C. P. in Cotesworth v. Spokes, but this is not so. That case decided that for a landlord to bring himself within the section he must prove that half-a-year's rent was in arrear at the time of the service of the writ. A passage at the end of the judgment (which was delivered by Williams, J.) was pressed upon us to show that the forfeiture was waived in the present case by what the landlord had done; but, in my judgment, though the passage is hard to understand, it does not decide this; and I must point out that it was not competent for the Court of C. P. to overrule the Court of K. B.; and it is not correct to say that it has done so. It should be noted that in Cotesworth v. Spokes the distress was within twenty-one days, which is not so in the present case; but be this as it may, in my judgment the case leaves that of Brewer v. Eaton untouched upon the point now under consideration. The Court of K. B. put the true construction upon the section, which has apparently been acted upon for over one hundred years, and as the plaintiff has fulfilled the requirements of sect. 210, he is entitled to judgment and this appeal must be allowed.—p. 696.

JAMES, L.J.—Another point which has been raised is, that the forfeiture by the default of the builder has been waived by the landowner. If this had been confined to a default in completing the houses at the date fixed, and the landowner had, after that date, gone on dealing with the builder on the footing of the agreement being still subsisting, I might have thought that this would have amounted to a waiver. It would require a good deal of consideration before I could assent to the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Doe v. Brindley.—p. 531.

the position has been altered, so that relief could not be given without causing injury to third parties. If, at the time of the application, the position is not altered in such a way as that to grant relief will cause injustice to third parties, I think, if the conditions mentioned in the section are complied with, that, according to the settled practice in equity, there is no longer a discretion in the judge, but that he ought to make the order. It does not matter whether it is called discretionary or not, if the discretion ought always to be exercised in one way. If the conditions are complied with, and no interests of third parties have intervened, there is no longer any real discretion in the matter.—p. 528.

[Where mortgagees by underlease applied for relief, under sect. 1 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, against forfeiture for non-payment of rent by the tenants in possession, it was held that relief ought not to be granted unless the original lessee was made a party to the application. Doe d. Whitfield v. Roe was distinguished on the grounds that it decided only that the mortgagee had the same right to relief against forfeiture for non-payment of rent as the lessee against whom recovery had been had, and that if it decided that relief could be granted in such a case, that would imply that the Courts of common law had before the Act the jurisdiction which was extended to them by that Act—namely, to deal with applications for relief after judgment and execution in ejectment, and sect. 1 of the Act was therefore unnecessary.]

Headnote.—Where in an action for re-entry upon breach of covenant to repair, the defendant applies to the Court for relief under sect. 14, sub-sect. 2, of the Conveyancing Act 1881, the Court may, in its discretion, make an order to stay the action upon payment by the defendant of the plaintiff's costs as between solicitor and client, as well as the costs of surveys and schedules of dilapidations. And the Court is not fettered by the Skinner's Co. v. Knight, which was a decision upon sect. 14, sub-sect. 1.

SUGDEN, L.C.—Thomas v. Cook established a new doctrine; but it proceeded upon the act of the former tenant, who had placed another in possession, and agreed to the latter becoming immediate tenant to the landlord. . . . If Thomas v. Cook is not to be overruled, the doctrine should not be carried further. The plaintiffs' counsel relied on Lynch v. Lynch as an authority that this doctrine equally applies to a freehold interest; but with the highest respect for the judges who decided that case, I cannot follow it.—p. 705.

CHITTY, J.—In Thomas v. Cook (2 B. & Ald. 119) there was in fact a change of possession, the old tenant, Cook, having gone out of possession when the plaintiff accepted Perkes as his tenant. . . . In his judgment in Davison v. Gent, Pollock, C.B. states the law thus: "It must therefore be taken to be established that where a lessee assents to a lease being granted to another, and gives up his own possession to the new lessee, that is a surrender by operation of law." This statement appears to me not to be qualified by any subsequent expressions in the same judgment. It substantially reconciles Thomas v. Cook with the principles enunciated by Parke, B. in Lyon v. Reed (13 M. & W. 285), so far as relates to leases in possession. It is not perhaps of any great practical importance in which of the two following ways the proposition of law is stated: (1) there is no surrender by operation of law unless the old tenant gives up possession to the new tenant at or about the time of the grant of the new lease to which he assents; or (2) the change of possession is a necessary part of the consent; I prefer, however, the first as being the more correct form. . . . The plaintiff's counsel relied on a dictum of Stirling, J. in Baring v. Abingdon that the granting of a new lease to a stranger with the assent of the lessee operates as a surrender of the old lease. But on the facts of the case it appears that there was a change of possession; the learned judge himself refers to Davison v. Gent (1 H. & N. 744), and I have his authority for stating that he did not intend to express any opinion on the point whether a change of possession was necessary.

the tenancy must be referred back to the time when the key was sent, before the rent became due. . . . All I can say is, that if the mere fact of the plaintiff letting the premises afterwards is considered in that case a ground for relation back I respectfully decline to follow that decision, for I see no principle on which it could be justified. If that is the ground of the decision we are not bound by it and ought to overrule it. If upheld, it is because the taking possession afterwards was not relied on as relating back to a former time, but as an explanation of an act done before, which so explained, amounted to a resumption of possession, and so the case came within Nicholls v. Atherstone (10 Q. B. 944; 16 L. J. Q. B. 371), and it is only so that I agree with Phené v. Popplewell.—p. 611.

WILLES, J.—It is quite in accordance with Doe d. Egremont v. Courtenay (11 Q. B. 702), and Doe d. Biddulph v. Poole (11 Q. B. 713), overruling the previous decision of Doe d. Egremont v. Forwood, to hold that where parties enter into a contract which would have the effect of rescinding a previous one, but which cannot operate according to their intention, the new contract shall not operate to affect the previously existing rights. This is good sense and sound reasoning, on which a jury might at least hold that there was no such intention. And if direct authority were wanted to sustain this conclusion, it is supplied by Moore v. Campbell (23 L. J. Ex. 310; 10 Ex. 323; 2 C. L. R. 1084), where, upon a plea of rescission, the very point was taken by Sir H. Hill, who would, no doubt, have made it good, had it been capable of being established.—p. 138.

laid down, of making a great advance on the law, as stated in previous decisions and in text-books, particularly Shepherd's Touchstone. Of course these decisions must be maintained in the limits to which they go. But the surrender in each of these cases was a result emanating from the power of the tenant alone, whereas in the case of a tenancy from year to year it emanates also from the power existing in the lessor, so that it is partly an effect of his own act, which cannot be undone. In my opinion, the doctrine of those cases cannot be extended to a case [like the present] where the elements exist of a tenancy from year to year, and where the new lease includes other lands.—p. 539.

SMITH, L.J.—The ratio decidendi of Moule v. Garrett is this: If A. is compellable to pay B. damages, which C. is also compellable to pay B., then A., having been compelled to pay B., can maintain an action against C. for money so paid, for the circumstances raise an implied request by C. to A. to make such payment in his case. In other words, A. can call upon C. to indemnify him. (See the notes to Lamplough v. Brathwaite, 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 9th ed., p. 160, and cases there cited.) To raise this implied request, both A. and C. must, in my judgment, be compellable to pay B.; otherwise, as it seems to me, the payment by A. to B., so far as regards C., is a voluntary payment, which raises no implication of a request by C. to A. to pay. If Cockburn, C.J., in his alternative reason in Moule v. Garrett for holding the defendants liable, meant this by the expression "by the legal default of another," I agree; but, if it means by a default for which they were not compellable to pay in that case to the original lessor, I do not agree, and none of the other learned judges who decided that case adopted what Cockburn, C.J., then said, and, indeed, Willes, J., expressly points out that the obligation of the contract must be common to the plaintiff and the defendants, and that the whole benefit was taken by the defendants.—p. 116.

TURNER, L.J. said it appeared to him unnecessary to consider any of the cases previous to Moore v. Choat. If, as it had been argued, the case of an equitable mortgagee was favourably considered by the Court, of course, if he were held liable, any other equitable assignee must be held in like manner. Hampshire v. Wickens (1878) 7 Ch. D. 555; 47 L. J. Ch. 243; 38 L. T. 408; 26 W. R. 491.

JESSEL, M.R.—Haines v. Burnett appears to me to be opposed both to principle and authority, and it must now be treated as distinctly overruled by Hodgkinson v. Crowe (L. R. 10 Ch. 622). In Haines v. Burnett, Lord Romilly, without any special provision having been made in the contract to that effect, held that a covenant should be inserted making the lease determinable on the bankruptcy of the lessee, or on his making any arrangement for the benefit of his creditors. That was in fact nothing less than a variation of the contract. I cannot see any reason for holding such a contract to be usual. Yet it is rather difficult, in looking at the case, to understand how it was decided. Lord Romilly seems to have thought that in considering general covenants, and all such other covenants as are usually inserted in leases of property of a similar description, some regard might be had to the peculiar nature and tenure of the property. But I cannot find any evidence on that point mentioned in the report, and it would seem that the judge, from his view of the nature of the property, inserted the clause. But when we look at the reasoning of Vice-Chancellor Bacon, in Hodgkinson v. Crowe, I think it is conclusive against any judge being allowed to say from his own view that such a covenant ought to be introduced. The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision, and went further, and held that, under an agreement for a lease to contain "all usual and customary mining clauses," the landlord was not entitled to have inserted in the lease a proviso for re-entry except on non-payment of rent.—p. 560.

BRETT, L.J.—Now the equitable doctrine was brought to a focus in Tulk v. Moxhay, which is the leading case on this subject. It seems to me that that case decided that an assignee taking land subject to a certain class of covenants is bound by such covenants if he has notice of them, and that the class of covenants comprehended within the rule is that covenants restricting the mode of using the land only will be enforced. It may be also, but it is not necessary to decide here that all covenants also which impose such a burden on the land as can be enforced against the land would be enforced (p. 407). . . . But it is said that if we decide for the defendants we shall have to overrule Cooke v. Chilcott. If that case was decided on the equitable doctrine of notice, I think we ought to overrule it. But I think that there is much to show that the ground of the decision was that Malins, V.-C. was of opinion—wrongly, as it now turns out—that the covenant ran with the land, and the decision of the Court of Appeal appears to have proceeded on an admission.—p. 408.

Tulk v. Moxhay, limited.

L. & S. W. Ry. v. Gomm (1882) 20 Ch. D. 562; 51 L. J. Ch. 530; 46 L. T. 449; 30 W. R. 620.—C.A.; reversing KAY, J.

[KAY, J. in the inferior Court dissented from the cases of Gilbertson v. Richards and Birmingham Canal Co. v. Cartwright. At the same time he held that in the present case the covenant did not create any estate or interest in land, and therefore was not obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities, and that specific performance must be decreed, the covenant being binding on an alienee with notice on the principle of Tulk v.

Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society, and the Court there decided that they would not extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay to affirmative covenants, compelling a man to lay out money, or do any other act of what I may call an active character, but that it was to be confined to restrictive covenants. Of course that authority would be binding upon us if we did not agree to it, but I most cordially accede to it. I think we ought not to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay in the way suggested here.—p. 586.

[Tulk v. Moxhay limited to restrictive stipulations, not to be extended so as to bind in equity a purchaser taking with notice of a covenant to expend money on repairs, or otherwise, which does not run with the land at law.]

COTTON, L.J.—The case principally relied upon by the appellant was one before Vice-Chancellor Malins. That was the case of Cooke v. Chilcott. Now undoubtedly the Vice-Chancellor did decide that case on the equitable doctrine, and said that he would enforce the covenants; but that is an authority which in my opinion was not right on that point. In the subsequent case of Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society—both Lord Justice Lindley and myself were members of the Court which decided that case—we expressed our opinion against Cooke v. Chilcott being a correct development of the doctrine established by Tulk v. Moxhay, or for which Tulk v. Moxhay was an authority. Then there was another case, before the late Lord Romilly, of Morland v. Cook, which was relied upon; but that was really a case not turning upon that doctrine, because it was this—there was a deed of partition of land all of which was below the sea level and was protected by a river or sea-wall, and a covenant was entered into by the different parties to pay their proportion of the expense of repairing the sea-wall, whoever should do it; and that covenant was enforced for and against the successors of those who were parties to the deed. But in that case it appeared that there was, according to the view of the Master of the Rolls, a common law liability, independently of that covenant, to repair the sea-wall, so that it would be very different from the case of creating a new liability; the covenant there was framed in such a way as to create a grant by the different persons who took, on partition, portions of the property or a rent-charge out of their lands in order to provide for the expense. The covenant was in this form: . . . So, although in terms it was a covenant, it was a covenant of those parties that the expense should be paid out of their proportions of the land by an acre-scut payable thereon in the same proportions in ready-money. That is, therefore, really a grant by each of the parties of a rent-charge of so much COTTON, L.J.—Here the plaintiff [the superior landlord] does not seek to restrain Ewin [the lessee] from using the house in a particular way, or from doing something which will enable the tenant so to use it, but to compel him to bring an action against his tenant who is in possession of the house. The principle of Tulk v. Moxhay has never been carried so far except in a case before Malins, V.-C.: Cooke v. Chilcott. The question came practically before the Court of Appeal in Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society, and the Court there laid down that the principle in Tulk v. Moxhay was not to be applied so as to compel a man to do that which will involve him in expense.

KAY, L.J. (for the Court).—In Bandy v. Cartwright the lease was by parol; it was held that a covenant for quiet enjoyment during the term could be implied, and further that such covenant was broken by a distress for a rent-charge granted before the parol demise by a predecessor in title of the lessor, under whom he claimed by purchase. The reason for this decision is not given in the report. Probably this parol lease was made by the word "demise," or, in the absence of evidence, that was assumed to be the case. That decision was followed in Hall v. City of London Brewery Co. The weight of authority is in favour of the view that a covenant in law is not implied from the mere relation of landlord and tenant, but only from certain words used in creating the lease. . . . In Holder v. Taylor the implied covenant seems to have been treated as an absolute covenant, broken by the fact that the lessor had no title at the date of the lease.

CHITTY, J.—In Locke v. Furze . . . the plaintiff was in possession when the lease, originally reversionary, but then possessory, was avoided by title paramount; and he remained in possession for a short period (some twenty days) during the currency of the term granted by the avoided lease, upon the covenant in which the action was brought. It is consequently no authority on the point (p. 85).

The plaintiff's counsel . . . cited the decision of the Court of Appeal in Gillard v. Cheshire Lines Committee. The Court there held that a person having a mere interesse terminum could maintain an action for injury to his right. The cases on trespass, though not cited, were of course present to the minds of the members of the Court who so held; there was no intention to overrule them, either directly or indirectly. . . . The judgment turned on the proposition that the defendants had injured the plaintiff's proprietary right. While accepting that decision, as I am bound to do without question, I think that it does not apply to the facts of this case. . . . The plaintiff has refrained, and as I think deliberately refrained, from exercising his right of entry under his voidable lease of 1887. I think he is not entitled to any damages; if I thought otherwise, I should assess them at a mere nominal sum.—p. 86.

BUCKLEY, J.—In Dennett v. Atherton Willes, J. stated the law in this way: "Now there can be no doubt that a proceeding of the Court of Chancery, or of a Court of common law, interfering with the title and possession of the land, does amount to a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. . . . On the other hand, it has long been settled that such a proceeding, interfering only with a particular mode of enjoyment of the land, or part of it, but not with the title or possession, is not a breach." . . .
Dennett v. Atherton was, however, considered and commented on in the C. A. in *Sanderson v.
 Berwick-upon-Tweed Corporation*. . . . Instating the law, Fry, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the Court, said this: ". . . It appears to us to be in every case a question of fact whether the quiet enjoyment of the land has or has not been interrupted; and where the ordinary and lawful enjoyment of the demised land is substantially interfered with by the acts of the lessor, or those lawfully claiming under him, the covenant appears to us to be broken, although neither the title to the land nor the possession of the land may be otherwise affected." Now, it is said by the defendant, and I think truly said, that *Sanderson v.
 Berwick-upon-Tweed Corporation* is the utmost extent to which this law has been carried. The law is by that decision extended beyond title and possession, to those cases in which quiet enjoyment of the land is substantially interfered with by the acts of the lessor. That case was again referred to in the C. A. in *Robinson v.
 Kilvert*. . . . Then the defendant has referred to *Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Ry. v.
 Anderson*, in which the present M.R., referring to Sanderson v. Berwick-upon-Tweed Corporation, says this: ". . . I take it that a mere temporary inconvenience caused by a lessor, not in depriving his tenant of a right of way, but in rendering his access less convenient than it was, is not a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment. A temporary inconvenience which does not interfere with the estate, or title, or possession, is not to my mind a breach of covenant, nor is there any case that goes anything like the length required to show that it is.
 Even the judgment of Fry, L.J. in the case that carried it furthest—Sanderson v. Berwick-upon-Tweed Corporation, in which he says that anything which substantially interferes with the facts then before the Court, which were that water was poured on the land demised so as to interfere with the enjoyment of the demised property. It did not interfere with the possession, except in a very technical sense, and still less with the title. . . . That is the greatest qualification of Sanderson v. Berwick-upon-Tweed Corporation which, so far I know, is to be found.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It is urged on behalf of the defendant that the present case is covered by the decision in Kelly v. Rogers, because the act of the superior landlord was not the act of any person claiming by, through, or under the defendant. If all that had happened here, were that judgment had been recovered against the defendant by his superior landlord, no doubt Kelly v. Rogers would have been a clear authority in the defendant's favour, but here, here is the fact that the defendant having a perfect defence to the action by the superior landlord, consented to judgment. It was this of his which caused the plaintiff to be turned out of possession, and the defendant thereby as guilty of a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment.—p. 906.

ASHBOURNE, C.—On the terms of the lease in Greenaway v. Adams, it would be difficult to come to any other conclusion, for it is impossible to see any difference, except in phraseology, between a covenant restraining alienation of a public-house and a covenant restraining sub-letting the same for the entire term for which it was held. On the other hand, in the covenant entered into between John D'Arcy and Denis Doyle, there is nothing whatever to indicate that the parties were thinking of the entire interest in the term. It may well be that the landlord has no objection to the premises being assigned, while he had an objection to their being sub-let.—p. 121.

PARKE, B.—It is more difficult to say that Doe v. Laming is not applicable. There, however, the demise was of a coffee-house, and, unless there was a distinct agreement with the lodger for the occupation of a particular room, it may be said he had not such an exclusive possession of it as would have entitled him to maintain trespass. If there had been any such distinct demise, then it would have resembled the case of a ready-furnished lodging, and the act might have come within the terms of the covenant. In this view the case of Doe v. Laming may be supported; but I cannot say that the grounds upon which Lord Ellenborough decided the case appear to be satisfactory to my mind.—p. 59.

upon the construction of the covenant and the words "or their successors in their late or present trade as brewers," though not in terms limiting the assigns to assigns in that position, afforded in that case a rule of construction. The Court accordingly held, that what was meant was successors carrying on the same trade, and not merely carrying on the trade of brewers, but carrying on the trade which was carried on by Phillips and Miall at that particular brewery. Now this particular clause which governs the construction of the covenant in Doe v. Reid does not occur in the present case, and its absence leads me to put a different construction and effect upon this covenant. . . .

JAMES, V.C.—The decision, Fielden v. Slater, has been pressed upon me; but I observe in that case the covenant was against the use of the house "for the sale of spirituous liquors;" here it is against using, exercising, or carrying on the business of "a seller" by retail of wine, beer, or spirituous liquors. Now at the time when this covenant was entered into there was a trade perfectly well known as the trade of an innkeeper or public-house keeper: and "the business of a expression which would naturally apply to the case of a gin-palace bar, or the like, and which might not have been thought sufficiently covered by the words "business of a tavern-keeper, inn-keeper, or publican." That was a trade perfectly well known; and it was against that trade that this covenant was directed, and not against the trade of a wine merchant. Since then, under the new excise laws, a perfectly new line of business has sprung up—this sale of wines and spirits in bottles by grocers, which is really only a modification of the old wine merchants' business.—p. 677.

Stuart v. Diplock (1890) 59 L. J. Ch. 142; 43 Ch. D. 343; 62 L. T. 333; 38 W. R. 223.—C.A. COTTON, BOWEN and FRY, L.J.J.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an action by a lady to restrain the defendant from carrying on the business of a ladies' outfitter at the house and shop No. 9, Mount Pleasant, Tunbridge Wells, on the ground that they took their lease of this house with notice of a covenant which prohibited the carrying on there of that business. The covenant was a covenant by the lessors contained in a lease of No. 10 to the plaintiff's testator, and was as follows: "That they will not permit or suffer to be carried on in or upon the adjoining dwelling-houses and shops known as 11 and 12 Mount Pleasant, the trades or businesses of ladies' outfitting, juvenile outfitting, or sale of baby linen, nor give their consent to such trades or businesses being carried on at or upon the shop numbered 9, Mount Pleasant, now occupied by Mr. Kempson as a wine merchant." . . .

Fielden v. Slater was relied on . . . but there the covenant was quite different. It was that the building should not be used "as an inn, public-house, or taproom, or for the sale of spirituous liquors, or ale, or beer," and the sale by the defendant of spirits in bottle, though in the course of his business as a grocer, was within the plain words of the covenant. If the covenant here had been framed with more careful regard to the interest of the plaintiff's testator it might have been said that the premises should not be used for the sale of ladies' underclothing, which would have made the case similar to Fielden v. Slater.

COTTON, L.J.—The defendant is proprietor of a theatre. Better means of egress being required, he pulled down a house adjoining the theatre, and erected a building of considerable height by there was a counter at which wine, spirits, and beer were sold to the persons frequenting the theatre. I think that this was a carrying on by the defendant of the trade of a retailer of wine, spirits, and beer. . . . The appellant relies on the case of Jones v. Bone. I do not understand James, L.J. to have decided in that case that there was no breach of covenant, but only that there was no case for an injunction.

Buckle v. Fredericks, followed.

Headnote.—The defendants were bound by a covenant in the lease of their house not to use the same as a coffee-house. They proposed, as ancillary to their business of grocers, to sell light refreshments consisting of cups of tea and coffee, bread and butter, &c., to be consumed by their customers on the premises. Held, following Buckle v. Fredericks and distinguishing Stuart v. Diplock, a violation of the covenant and an injunction granted.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is obvious from the report of the case [Fitz v. Iles] that the whole contest was directed to the question whether there was any infringement of the covenant, and not to the question of the right to sue. . . . Kemp v. Bird was not cited in Fitz v. Iles, and I think Kemp v. Bird is binding on me. Perhaps I ought not to say that, if I were obliged to choose between the two cases, Kemp v. Bird seems to be sounder with regard to the law, but it does seem so to my mind.—p. 49.

COTTON, L.J.—Here there has been a sale to the plaintiff by the lessors of the goodwill of the business. The plaintiff is, therefore, independently of the question whether the covenant runs with the land, entitled to sue so far as by assignment the landlord who entered into this covenant could give him the right. That being so, the difficulty as to the title to sue which there was in the case of Renals v. Cowlishaw . . . is got rid of. There is no doubt that there is here an actual assignment of the benefit of the covenant . . . even if that benefit did not pass by the mere assignment . . . of the reversion of this public-house.

[Held by the Court of Appeal, on the authority of Tatem v. Chaplin, Clegg v. Hands, and *Fleetwood v. But, if it is to be taken as a decision that a landlord is responsible for the act of his tenant in creating a nuisance by the manner in which he uses the premises demised, we think it goes beyond the principle to be found in any previously decided cases, and we cannot assent to it.—p. 805.

MARTIN, B.—Gandy v. Jubber was decided on the ground of the interest that existed between the reversioner and the tenant: and the Court said (what I doubt) that there was a fresh letting from year to year. My brother Blackburn was evidently not entirely satisfied with the judgment on that point.

BLACKBURN, J.—Gandy v. Jubber appears to have been not quite correctly reported in Best & Smith, for I seem to speak of Rich v. Basterfield as being a sensible judgment, whereas for long before that time I was of opinion it was desperately refined.

Gandy v. Jubber, discussed.

Sandford v. Clarke (1888) 57 L. J. Q. B. 507; 21 Q. B. D. 398; 59 L. T. 226; 37 W. R. 28; 52 J. P. 773.—WILLS and GRANTHAM, JJ.

WILLS, J.—An owner of real property is bound to maintain his premises so as not to be dangerous to persons frequenting the highway of which they form a portion. It seems to me that the liability is clear on the authority of Gandy v. Jubber. That was the case of a tenancy from year to year, and the Court of Q. B. held that the nature of the tenancy was such that the landlord might re-enter at the end of every year; but the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the undelivered judgment referred to, thought that view was erroneous; and Martin, B. in Bartlett v. Baker [34 L. J. Ex. p. 11], was of opinion that the decision of the Q. B. was not right. That decision was due to the misapprehension of the true nature of a tenancy from year to year. That tenancy does not of itself and mechanically come to an end, but requires legal notice on the part of either side to determine it.—p. 508.

Jones v. Mills (1861) 10 C. B. (N.S.) 788; 31 L. J. C. P. 66; 8 Jur. (N.S.) 387; 58 J. P. 213.—C.P., followed.

Bowen v. Anderson (1893) [1894] 1 Q. B. 164; 10 R. 47; 42 W. R. 236.—WILLS and COLLINS, JJ.

WILLS, J.—With regard to the case of Sandford v. Clarke, I think that the decision in that case was right, but that the grounds on which I based my decision were wrong. There was in that case ample evidence that the defect was structural, and had existed at the time when the tenancy was created, and the landlord was therefore rightly held to be liable; but the ground on which I based my decision was that a weekly tenancy terminates at the end of each week without any notice, and that there had therefore been a reletting of the premises after the defect occurred. . . . It is clear from Jones v. Mills (31 L. J. C. P. 66) that some notice is necessary to put an end to a weekly tenancy (though the Court in that case were not unanimous as to what the notice should be), and that the continuance of the tenancy on the expiration of each week does not render the landlord liable for defects then existing as he would be in the case of a letting.

Hart v. Windsor (1843) 12 M. & W. 68; 13 L. J. Ex. 129; 8 Jur. 150.—EX.

PARKE, B. (for the Court).—But the defendant chiefly rests his case upon the decision of Smith v. Marrable. My judgment in that case certainly proceeded upon the authority of two previous decisions, which, though they continued a novel doctrine, had not been questioned in Westminster Hall, and had received, to a certain degree, the sanction of the Lord Chief Justice Tindal in a subsequent case. Those cases were Edwards v. Etherington, before Lord Tentorden, and afterwards the Court of King's Bench; and Collins v. Barrow; and the last that before Lord Chief Justice Tindal, was Salisbury v. Marshall; and I thought they established the doctrine, not merely that there was an implied contract on the part of the lessor, that the house demised should be habitable, but an implied condition, that the lease should be void if it were not, and the tenant chose to quit. From the full discussion which those cases have now undergone, on the present argument and that in the recent case of Sutton v. Temple (12 M. & W. 52), I feel satisfied they cannot be supported, if the reports of them are correct; and we all concur in opinion that they are not law—an opinion strongly intimated, in the case of Sutton v. Temple, in which this Court decided that there was no implied warranty of condition or fitness for a particular purpose on a lease of aftermath. We are under no necessity of deciding in the present case, whether that of Smith v. Marrable be law or not. It is distinguishable from the present case on the ground on which it was put by Lord Abinger, both on the argument of the case itself, but more fully in that of Sutton v. Temple; for it was the case of a demise of a ready-furnished house for a temporary residence at a watering-place. It was not a lease of real estate merely. But that case certainly cannot be supported on the ground on which I rested my judgment.—p. 86.

Wilson v. Finch Hatton (1877) 2 Ex. D. 336; 46 L. J. Ex. 489; 36 L. T. 473; 25 W. R. 537.

KELLY, C.B.—I am prepared to hold that the law, as laid down in Smith v. Marrable, is good and sound law, and I may add that, although some discussion may have taken place about that case, and although some doubts may have been thrown on the law as there propounded by judges of learning and eminence, still I have no hesitation in holding that it is an implied condition in the letting of a furnished house that it shall be reasonably fit for habitation.—p. 343.

 BACON, V.-C.—If that case [Smith v. Marrable] had remained completely untouched, and was still . . . the law of the land, yet that is only an authority for the proposition that in taking furnished apartments at the seaside, or for temporary occupation only, there is an implied warranty that they must be fit for occupation. . . . Parke, B., who was one of the judges who decided Smith v. Marrable, was anxious to pare down that decision to some extent and to limit it to the facts which existed in that particular case.

SMITH, L.J.—Our attention has been called to what was said by Kelly, C.B. towards the exclusion of his judgment in Wilson v. Finch Hatton, but it seems to me apparent from earlier passages that the judgment of the learned judge did not go, and was not intended to go beyond the decision in Smith v. Marrable [which does not extend the warranty beyond the commencement of the term]. . . . It seems to me that what the learned Chief Baron desired to point out in the passage that has been relied on was that the plaintiff was entitled to enter into occupation on the 7th of May, and if the house was not in a fit state until the 26th of May, she did not get what she bargained for.—p. 39.

ERLE, C.J.—The whole tenor of my judgment in that case is distinctly to the effect that there is no such liability cast upon the keeper of a boarding-house, and that it would be an unreasonable thing to make a person responsible for the safety of the goods which are never entrusted to his safety at all; and I am strongly opposed to the imposition of such a liability upon a lodging-house keeper. The other judges who differed from me in the case of Dansey v. Richardson were only taking up the proposition which was assumed there, but was not the proposition in dispute in the case.—p. 266.

KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—On examining these cases, therefore, I think I am justified in saying that, except Walker v. Eastern Counties Ry., there is no case in which it has been held that a bill for specific performance would lie on a so-called notice to treat, even by the landowner. In Pinchin v. London and Blackwall Ry. (post), Wood, V.-C. thought Walker v. Eastern Counties Ry. not binding, and Stuart, V.-C., in plain terms, thought such a bill would not lie. Indeed, the decree in Walker v. Eastern Counties Ry. was most anomalous, and without precedent, for it directed a thing to be done (summoning a jury) to create a new fact to be imported, by some means, into the suit; there being no declaration that there should be specific performance; and reserved further directions and costs. Further consideration is never reserved, except upon inquiries, and if an issue is directed, the case stands over until after trial. Such a decree would present a strange spectacle of compelling a company to do that which they are perfectly willing to do, and may do any moment.—p. 582.

BACON, V.-C.—There there had been a litigation disposed of by a decree and no question raised by the defendants whether they were or were not bound to fulfil the contract, the decree having been in the terms in which it appears to have been. On further consideration there was no other mode of dealing with it, the matter was concluded, the decree had settled it. They were to be purchasers, they did not dispute it themselves, and thereupon the duty was incumbent upon them to do that which was necessary in order to give full effect to that decree, and that is all the order on further consideration did.—p. 37.

PEARSON, J.—But, having read Flamank, Ex parte, very carefully, I am compelled to say that I am utterly unable to follow it. With all respect for Lord Cranworth, looking at the reasons which he gives for his judgment, it seems to me utterly impossible to say that any title to the money had been acquired by the personal representative. In that case, as in the present, land belonging to a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition had been taken under the Lands Clauses Act, and the purchase-money had been paid into Court. After the death of the lunatic the question arose whether the money was to be treated as real or as personal estate, and Lord Cranworth held that it was personal estate. He said: "Now did sect. 7 authorise Cross (the lunatic) to sell or did it not? If it did, the effect, in my opinion, was to make his contract as good as if he had been compos mentis; and his executrixes would clearly be entitled to the 740*l*. He was compelled to sell; but, when he had sold, he stood in the same situation as he would have been in if he had been compos mentis and had sold voluntarily." Now, looking at the terms of sect. 7, I am unable to come to the conclusion that it authorises, or was intended to authorise, or that it can be construed as enabling, a person of unsound mind himself to do that which he would otherwise have been incapable of doing. Inasmuch as that section says that the persons who are to be able to sell the lands of lunatics or idiots are, not the lunatics or idiots themselves, but their committees, it seems to me impossible to conceive that it could have been intended that a person who from his condition of mind was absolutely incapable of entering into any agreement should be able to enter into an agreement to sell his land. There are, moreover, other sections of the Act which point out what is to be done in such cases. . . . Then Lord Cranworth continued: "If he was not authorised to sell, and, therefore, the company were not justified in taking his land under the compulsory powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, still the devisees under his will cannot be entitled to the money. Their claim would be to the land, and not to the money. And it does not lie in the mouth of the company to make objection; for they have taken the land, and, therefore, they cannot say there was no authority to take it. Therefore I can deal with the money in no other way than as if it had been paid for the purchase of land sold by a person seised in fee, and who is competent to sell it." I have read that passage over a great many times, and, with all respect to Lord Cranworth, I find it impossible to understand how he could have arrived at such a conclusion. The purchase-money was in Court, and the heir, who could have brought ejectment for the land, was willing to accept the money and to confirm the sale, and yet Lord Cranworth arrived at the extraordinary conclusion that the money must be handed over to persons who could not make out any title to it or to the land. The land might be taken from the company because they had bought it from the wrong person, and the money must be taken away from them, because they could be heard to say that they had not bought from the right person. I cannot understand why a Court of equity, having the money in its hands, should not be able to say, "A mistake having been made, which is capable of being set right by paying the money to the rightful owner of the land who is willing to accept it, let justice be done by paying the money to him."—pp. 312—314.

SIR B. COLLIER (for the COURT).—It should be observed as to that case, which dealt with the construction of the Lands Clauses Act, that in that Act were several headings so drawn as to be applicable grammatically to the sections which followed them. The heading then in question was this: "And with respect to small portions of intersected land, be it enacted as follows." Then came two sections: first, the 93rd, relating to lands not being situate in a town; and then the 94th, beginning with "If SUCH land shall be so cut through and divided." It was held by the H. L. that "SUCH land" referred, not to land mentioned in sect. 93, but referred back to the heading before sect. 93; namely, "with respect to small portions of intersected land, be it enacted as follows." That case appears to their lordships to have no application to the present. Here the heading "officers" is not such a heading as could be grammatically read into any of the sections which follow. It seems to their lordships to have been inserted for the purpose of convenience of reference, and not intended to control the interpretation of the clauses which follow.—p. 369.

CHITTY, J.—It appears that Lord Selborne in Williams v. Aylesbury and Buckingham Ry., after the order had been made for a sale, made an order in the form that Mr. Farwell asks for at the bar, and that is the order asked for upon the present notice of motion. The order asked for in Williams v. Aylesbury, &c. Ry. was for delivery of possession to the plaintiff, but the L.C. declined to make that order in the first instance, because he said that the plaintiff had elected to take his remedy founded on a lien, and obtained an order for sale, and consequently he declined to make the order which is stated in Seton on Decrees (4th ed. p. 1331), unless it was proved to his satisfaction that the order for sale would not be carried out. . . . Selwyn, L.J. stated the law with regard to this matter correctly, if I may say so with respect to him, in Wing v. Tottenham, &c. Ry. He said: "I have no hesitation in saying that the whole practice of the Court shows that a vendor of land to a railway company is, with respect to his lien, in no different position from a vendor of land to any other person." . . . There is nothing in the case before Giffard, L.J. of Munns v. Isle of Wight Ry. to conflict with what I have stated. He in that case thought that there had been a miscarriage in granting the injunction, and, as I read his judgment, he thought it reasonable to discharge the injunction, and he made an order for a receiver with a direction against the company, who were to give immediate possession to the receiver.—pp. 573, 574.

JESSEL, M.R.—There is one case before Bacon, V.-C., Eccleshill Local Board, In re, where he adverted to the fact of the verdict of the jury having been given, and he held interest to arise from that moment, though possession was not taken until afterwards. I am quite unable to understand the principle on which that case proceeded. I am not embarrassed by it, because I have no verdict of a jury to deal with in this case; but I am free to confess that if I had that case to deal with, I should not have been able to decide it otherwise than I have decided the one before me.—p. 154.

• BUCKLEY, J.—The facts there [Caledonian Ry. v. Carmichael] were that the railway company were to become debtors to Sir Thomas Carmichael in an event. They acquired the surface of a subterranean stone that was there upon terms that when a future event happened—namely, when a certain face of stone was exposed—they should become debtors to Sir Thomas in a certain sum. When the event happened upon which they were to become debtors to him he did not take the steps which were necessary for ascertaining what was the debt. He never asked for payment. Then the ordinary rule applied that a debt does not carry interest except by way of contract, if there be such, or by operation of law if notice be given pursuant to the statute. There was neither one nor the other. So that is a case in which it appears to me that principles upon which I decide this case have no application at all.—p. 593.

FRY, J.—Different judges have taken different views, and indeed the same judges have acted differently at different times. But I find that the question came before the present L.C., who was then L.C., though he was trying the cases set down before the M.R. in Boyd's Settled Estates, In re, and he decided that the power of investment conferred by Lord St. Leonard's Act does not apply to funds which, by the special Act under which they are paid into Court, are directed to be invested in a particular way. I think I am bound by that decision. I am quite aware that Malins, V.-C. has expressed an opinion that it was to be treated as only the decision of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and that it was not binding on him. But the present M.R. has taken an opposite view, and I agree with him. I think the L.C., wherever he is sitting and whatever cases he is trying, is still L.C., and that his decision is binding on me. I shall, therefore, follow Boyd's Settled Estates, In re, and shall refuse the application for investment in India Four per cent. Stock. I should be very glad if the question were taken before the C. A., for there is really a serious conflict in the decisions.—p. 648.

In Pfleger, In re, Giffard, V.-C. directed an annuity to be purchased for the life of the petitioner, so as to give her the same income as before, but as she thus received more than she would have received if the fund had been invested in an annuity to last as long as the term, the case decides nothing in favour of the respondents.—p. 36.

STIRLING, J.—In Hobson's Trusts, In re, the question arose under the L. C. C. Act, 1845. . . . James, L.J. said: "When a share has been settled by a marriage settlement duly executed by an adult, and the trustees have a power of sale, the trustees are persons absolutely entitled to the share which has been vested in them." This decision was acted upon in many subsequent cases, including Ward's Estate, In re, where an order was made for payment to trustees who held upon trust to sell at the request in writing of the tenant for life, who joined in the petition. However, in Smith, In re . . . Cotton and Bowen, L.J.J. expressed serious doubts as to the correctness of the view expressed by James, L.J. in Hobson's Trusts, In re; while Lindley, L.J. said that he was not prepared to say that the Court might not have jurisdiction, under the L. C. C. Act, 1845, to order payment out to trustees. All the learned judges agreed that the jurisdiction, if it existed, ought not to be exercised in the case before them. These cases are all decisions upon the L. C. C. Act, 1845, but the language of the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, 1856, is so nearly identical that they have always been taken to be authorities in construing the latter statute. In that state of the authorities, it seems to me that Hobson's Trusts, In re, has not been overruled.—p. 737.

ESHER, M.R.—Lord Westbury himself, in the subsequent case of St. Sepulchre, sitting in the same Court in which he sat when he decided Cherry's Settled Estates, In re, explained the grounds of his judgment in that case. He said: "The language of the Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 34), which was in question in Cherry's Settled Estates, In re, was such as to render transactions under it as though they had been transactions under the antecedent Act of 3 & 4 Vict., and to pass over the Lands Clauses Act altogether; and it followed that the provisions of that general Act could not affect such transactions." That is, he read the new Act into the old Act, instead of reading the old Act into the new Act. . . . His decision, therefore, in Cherry's Settled Estates, In re, does not touch the present case, in which, as I think, upon a true construction of the two Acts, the old Act is to be read into the new Act. But I will say candidly, that that explanation of Cherry's Settled Estates, In re, is far too refined for my comprehension. I think that if we had to decide that case now we should decide it directly contrary to the way in which Lord Westbury decided it, and when I read his judgment in the St. Sepulchre's Case, I cannot help thinking that if he had then had to decide Cherry's Settled Estates, In re, again, he would have decided it in exactly the contrary way. Whenever Cherry's Settled Estates, In re, is cited hereafter, it will be explained away. I think, therefore, the best thing is to drop it altogether.—p. 617."

CORTON, L.J.—The first question we have to decide is whether the Lands Clauses Act is to be considered as incorporated in 3 & 4 Vict. c. 87, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 34, under which the Commissioners acted. It cannot be suggested that the Lands Clauses Act was incorporated in those Acts. That point was decided by Lord Westbury in Cherry's Settled Estates, In re. In Wood's Estate, In re, the present M.R., though dealing with another question, decided that the case was erroneous and ought to be set aside. I cannot agree with him in that. I think the decision . . . in that case was right, and that it cannot be disregarded.—p. 65.

JAMES, L.J.—But for the future, for the benefit of railway companies and other public bodies paying money into Court, I desire to follow the precedent laid down by Lord Hatherley, when V.-C., in Hungerford's Trusts, In re. In the future, therefore, this wholesome rule may fairly be laid down, that whenever there is a petition simply for the reinvestment of money in land, and there are mortgagees or annuitants whose rights are not otherwise affected by the petition, the proper course will be to serve such mortgagees or annuitants with a copy of the petition, and to pay them 40s. for costs, giving them at the same time an intimation that if they appear upon the hearing, they will probably have to pay their own costs.—p. 333. JESSEL, M.R.—In Hatfield's Estate, In re, it was held, upon a petition for payment out to a mortgagee, that the company was not liable to pay any of the mortgagee's costs at all. But that is not the rule now, for it is only fair that the mortgagees should have some costs. . . . In Halstead United Charities, In re, Malins, V.-C. held that the rule laid down in Gore-Langton's Estates, In re, applied to the case of a petition for the payment out of Court with the consent of the incumbrancers; and he also held that the petitioners were entitled to add to their costs of the petition, in addition to the 40s., a sum sufficient to cover the costs of an affidavit of service.—p. 625.

NORTH, J.—In Halstead United Charities, In re as in this case, the mortgages had been made before payment into Court: in most of the other cases the mortgages had been made after payment in. In Gore-Langton's Estates the money was being reinvested in land, not paid out to mortgagees. In Olive's Estate, In re (post), the corporation relied on Jones' Trust Estate, In re (post), but it was decided that they must pay the costs of the mortgagee's appearance, those costs being limited to 42s., and the costs of serving the mortgagee with the petition. I think that Halstead United Charities, In re, Artizans' Dwellings Act, In re, and Olive's Estate, In re, settle that the mortgagees are entitled to have their costs paid by the corporation; but they have also settled what the amount of such costs is to be. . . . In Halstead United Charities, In re, when the petition was presented it was known that the mortgagees were not claiming the fund.—p. 638.

CHITTY, J.—In this case the system of scale fees has been adopted in the purchase of the land, and where the scale system is used there does not appear to be any such difficulty as was indicated by Knight Bruce, L.J. [in London (Bishop), Ex parte] and Wood, V.-C. [in Christ's Hospital, In re], so that their observations are without force when the scale fee system has been adopted, and, however true at the time when they were made, are not of universal application at the present day. There is great inequality in the amounts here and the decision . . . in St. Bartholomew's Hospital, In re, treats that fact as enough for making an exception to the ordinary rule as to costs. Without departing from the rule in London (Bishop), In re, I think that there ought to be apportionment of the costs of the purchase of the land, so far as the scale fees go, amongst the various public bodies, according to the amount of the purchase-money contributed by them.—p. 52.

JESSEL, M.R.—When two companies are amalgamated, the new company is only liable to pay such costs as are properly payable at the date of the petition. If the fund in Court had been paid in by three companies, all of which were now amalgamated with the L. & N. W. Ry. Co., I should not allow three petitions to be presented for the purpose of getting out the separate portions of the fund; if such a thing were done I should certainly give only one set of costs against the company. That being so, a petition is presented in respect of which the L. & N. W. Ry. Co. is liable to one set of costs, and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry. Co. is also liable to one set of costs; and under the circumstances I think the costs must be borne by the two companies equally. I admit that there is a decision [Maryport, &c. Ry. Act, In re] the other way, but for the reasons I have given I am unable to follow it.—p. 361.

MALINS, V.-C. (after discussing the earlier cases) said: These cases thoroughly settle the practice of this Court, but it was contended on the part of the petitioners that as the money in this case was originally paid into the Court of Ex., from which it was in 1828 or thereabouts transferred to this Court, and the jurisdiction also transferred, that the case was governed by the decision of the M.R. in Robertson, In re, and Tiverton Market Act, In re. . . . With those two decisions of the M.R. I entirely and heartily concur, and I so entirely concur with them that I should gladly have followed them if I had not been precluded from doing so by subsequent decisions. But the point came before Kindersley, V.-C. in Metford's Trust, In re, and he there decided that, although the money was originally paid into the Court of Ex., they [the company] were not liable to pay the costs of the petition to take it out of Court. And again, in Musgrave, In re, the same point was decided. . . . The same question came before Stuart, V.-C. in Ecclesiastical Commissioners, Ex parte. His expression is that "He should only charge those companies (there were seventeen of them) with the petitioner's costs whose Acts expressly authorised the Court to charge them with the costs of paying out the principal money, and should not follow the practice of the Court of Ex. as to money paid into that Court."—p. 78.

FRY, J.—It is said that the 85th section (Land Clauses Act, 1845) can only be used in cases of urgency, and that in the present instance there was no urgency. For that I am referred to Field v. Carnarvon and Llanberis Ry. Probably if the case were before me without reference to any authority, I should feel great difficulty in coming to any such conclusion as Malins, V.-C. there expressed. The words of the 85th section require only a desire on the part of the company to enter and use the lands, and the very fact of the company exercising the powers given by the section is sufficient evidence of such a desire. But even if the decision in that case is to be treated as binding on me in the present case, I think that there was that urgency which justified the company in exercising the power.—p. 573.

EARL CAIRNS.—It is settled law that the powers under the 85th section [Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845], even in the case of a compulsory purchase, are not compulsory powers, and are exercisable after the period for compulsory purchase has expired: Salisbury (Marquis) v. G. N. Ry. (supra) (p. 488). . . . I take it also to be a principle which runs through the whole course of the decisions under the Lands Clauses Act, that whenever a right to compensation is provided for a landowner by the machinery of the Act, it is given as the sole remedy, and that where it exists it does not exist along with a right in the landowner, at his option, to repudiate the right to compensation and recover the land. I take this to have been the principle on which Lind v. Isle of Wight Ferry Co. (supra, col. 1507) was decided by the late Lord Hatherley.—p. 491.

• LORD BRAMWELL.—In Salisbury (Marquis) v. G. N. Ry. there is no limitation put by the Court on the time within which the company may complete, having entered under sect. 85. It was not said in the report nor in the judgment whether the time for exercising the powers for making the railway had or had not expired. . . . Worsley v. South Devon Ry. (supra), was a special pleading question in form, but in reality a substantial question. The Court decided that, whereas it was contended that the replication was good, because the pleas disclosed no claim to an interest in land, that the interest claimed by the pleas is much more than a licence." But from what appears in the report all that the defendants claimed was that they had "entered and continued in possession." Lord Campbell in Salisbury (Marquis) v. G. N. Ry. expressly says, referring to this case, that "a plea of entry by a railway company under similar circumstances was held to set up a legal interest in the land." In Doe v. North Staffordshire Ry. (supra) the judgment is that the absence of the word "take" in the 85th section is immaterial, that the landowner is to take steps to ascertain compensation under sect. 68. And the Court says, "If the original entry was lawful the present possession is lawful." Not a word about its only being so till the general powers expire. The whole tenor of the authorities is that when the notice to treat has been given each party is bound for ever, and that though it is so, powers under sect. 85 must be exercised by entry within the time limited for exercising general powers, though that suffices to give a possessory title whether the railway is finished or not.—p. 510.

BAGGALLAY, L.J. (having referred to Tiverton, &c., Ry. v. Loosemore) continued: I think we have got the principle applicable to a case of this kind recognised in the judgment of Lord Cairns. . . . It appears to me that that case affirms this proposition. You have got the relative position of vendor and purchaser established by the notice to treat. It may be worked out in one of two ways. It may be worked out either by actual agreement between them, or by an arbitration, or by giving permission to the railway company to enter before the settlement of the amount has been come to, and their paying the amount into Court under the 85th section. In my opinion, it is equally a taking in each of these cases. The landowner is deprived during the notice to treat of the power of exercising any control over his land. What is the effect then of an abandonment? It is simply this, that although you have taken the land you may give it up, and instead of paying the full price which you would have had to pay if you had retained it for the purposes of your railway, you shall pay for that limited use which you have acquired over it, and by means of which you have made your railway (p. 248). [His lordship then discussed G. W. Ry. v. Swindon and Cheltenham

Extension Ry. and continued:] There had been an arbitration for settling the amount to be paid for the use of this easement [to carry their railway across the G. W. Ry.] which was granted to the Swindon and Cheltenham Co. by the G. W. Ry. Co., and the amount was paid into Court under the 85th section. That again was not the compulsory taking of land. There was a difference of opinion, I think, between the learned lords who decided the case, as to the meaning of the words "taking of land." Lord Bramwell seems to have thought that the easement was land within the meaning of the Act, and Lord Fitzgerald was of opinion that it was not, and came to the conclusion that what was to be done under the 85th section was not the exercise of compulsory powers: but both those learned lords agreed in affirming the decision of the Court below, that the Swindon Co. could not be restrained, Lord Watson taking a contrary view.—p. 250. CHELMSFORD, L.C.—As far as I have been able to examine the cases, in all of them except two, in which an individual has been allowed to maintain an action for damage which he has specially sustained by the obstruction of a highway, the injury complained of has been personal to himself, either immediately or by immediate consequence. The two excepted cases are those of Baker v. Moore, mentioned by Gould, J. in Iveson v. Moore ((1699) 1 Ld. Raym. 486, 491; 1 Salk. 16) and Wilkes v. Hungerford Market Co. (supra). . . . Baker v. Moore appears to me to be even more doubtful than Wilkes v. Hungerford Market Co., and as to this latter case, Erle, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the majority of the judges in the present case, observed: "If the question were raised in an action now, we think it probable that the action would fail, both from the effect of the cases which preceded Wilkes's Case, and also from the reasoning of the judgment in Caledonian Ry. v. Ogilvy (supra)."
In this observation upon Wilkes's Case I entirely agree . . . Upon an examination of the cases, it will be seen that in most of them, where the claim to compensation was admitted, there was an actual injury to the house or land itself, either immediate or immediately consequential upon the acts done. [His lordship distinguished Reg. v. Eastern Counties Ry. (supra), Reg. v.

G. N. Ry., and Chamberlain v. West End, &c. Ry. (supra), on this ground, and continued:] But Senior v. Metropolitan Ry. cannot be otherwise regarded than as precisely resembling the present. . . . This case, then, in which the judgments are not very satisfactory, is the only direct authority against the judgment of the Court of Ex. Ch. under consideration. When I say the only authority I have not forgotten Cameron v. Charing Cross Ry., where, upon a similar state of facts, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff. But the C.J. stated that the Court decided against the argument on the part of the company on the ground that the matter had already undergone consideration in two Courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction. By whose judgment the Court was bound, the C.J. being evidently not satisfied with those decisions. Thus the question stands upon the cases relied upon in the argument for the plaintiff in error, and, if I am right in treating the decision in Senior v. Metropolitan Ry. as the only one which can be regarded as a direct authority in his favour, there is opposed to that decision Reg. v. London Dock Co. (supra), which is at least an equally strong authority the other way.—pp. 213—216.

LORD CRANWORTH.—I fully subscribe to that decision [Reg. v. London Dock Co.]; and though, according to the language of the statute then under discussion, the compensation was to be given for injury to be occasioned to any person in his estate or interest in any lands or houses, and not, as in the present case, under the Lands Clauses Act, in consequence of his interest in any land being injuriously affected; yet the meaning of the legislature in both cases seems to me to be the same.—p. 219.

CARRNS, L.C.—The case appears to me to be extremely analogous to . . . Beckett v. Midland Ry. (post, col. 1538), in which there was, in front of the premises question in that case, one single highway, the farther half, or the farther third portion of which was taken off and blocked by the execution of the defendant company's works. It was there held that that was an injury which permanently and injuriously affected the premises in question: and it appears to me to be a matter entirely indifferent whether you have one highway, the farther half of which is blocked up and destroyed, or whether you have a double highway, first by land and then by water, and the part of the highway which consists of water is blocked up and destroyed. . . . Mr. Thesiger stated what he would rely upon as a definition of the right to compensation, and having considered this case very fully, I myself should not be disposed to find fault with any part of that definition, although definitions are always matters of very considerable difficulty. Mr. Thesiger stated that the test which he would submit as one which he thought would explain and reconcile the various cases upon this subject, was this, that where by the construction of works there is a physical interference with any right, public or private, which the owners or occupiers of property are by law entitled to make use of, in connection with such property, and which right gives an additional market value to such property, apart from the uses to which any particular owner or occupier might put it, there is a title to compensation, if, by reason of such interference, the property, as a property, is lessened in value. My lords, a case was decided in your lordships' House which at first sight was supposed to militate against this proposition and against the decision in the present case—I mean Ricket v. Metropolitan Ry.—but in truth that case has no application whatever to the present. The circumstances out of which the claim was there made were these: There was an interruption—only a temporary interruption—to a particular trade carried on in particular premises, and the claim made was not a claim for injury to the property at all, it was a claim in respect of loss suffered in carrying on a trade. My lords, the words of the definition which I have read are entirely clear of a case of that kind, and although it is unnecessary to do so, I may observe that I do not think your lordships would in any way propose now to depart from the decision in Ricket v. Metropolitan Ry.—p. 253.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The judges in the Ex. Ch. who decided this case in favour of the respondent appear to have been governed in their opinion principally by Chamberlain v. Westminster End of London, &c. Ry. (supra, col. 1531), and entered very fully into the consideration of the question whether that case would be regarded as having been overruled by the decision of this House in Ricket v. Metropolitan Ry. I confess it appears to me extraordinary that so much time should have been occupied upon a question upon which, from the language I used, and which chiefly engaged the attention of the learned judges, I should have thought there could be no doubt. I took some pains to distinguish the two cases. . . . I observed that Chamberlain's Case must be classed with the preceding cases where the house or land of the person claiming compensation was itself injuriously affected. By these words I plainly expressed the distinction between the two cases, because in Ricket's Case the jury found there was no damage done to the structure of the house, i.e., to the premises (p. 245). This case is clearly distinguishable from that of Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, although bearing some resemblance. . . . There can be no doubt that that case was properly decided, as there was nothing to show that the rights obstructed were in any peculiar manner connected with the claimant's premises, nor was there any finding that the premises were by the obstruction diminished in value. It is a case precisely similar to that of Caledonian Ry. v. Ogilvy (supra, col. 1530). . . . Holding, as I do, Beckett's Case to have been rightly decided, it appears to me that the present case is scarcely distinguishable from it. . . . I cannot help observing that the judges in the Court below appear to have needlessly embarrassed themselves with the consideration whether this case is distinguishable from Ricket's Case. The distinction is marked and obvious. In Ricket's Case there was no finding which related to the premises, but merely of a personal damage; here the special case expressly states an injury and damage to the premises.—p. 259.

LORD HATHERLEY to the same effect.

LORD PENZANCE.—A rule has been established in these cases from which it would, I think, be disastrous to depart. It is this, that whether damage can be recovered under the words "injuriously affected" depends upon whether it might have been the subject of an action if the works which caused it had been done without the authority of Parliament. Notwithstanding the doubts and adverse criticisms expressed in the last case [Ricket v. Metropolitan Ry.] by the late Lord Westbury . . . I trust this rule will be adhered to.—p. 261.

LORD O'HAGAN.—I confess, my lords, that if the case were entirely new, I should scarcely be disposed to agree with some observations which have fallen from Lord Penzance. . . . I should have been very much disposed to agree with the strong observations made by Lord Westbury in Ricket's Case, to the effect that there really is not in the statute itself anything to justify the importation of a narrow construction of that description (p. 265). . . . I am very glad that we have now his [Lord Chelmsford's] authoritative declaration, sitting as he did as President of this House at the time, that Ricket's Case was not decided upon any principle inconsistent with Chamberlain's Case.—p. 269.

SELBORNE, L.C.—For the appellants it was contended that compensation was excluded by Caledonian Ry. v. Ogilvy (supra, col. 1530), and Ricket v. Metropolitan Ry. The respondents relied on Metropolitan Board of Works v. McCarthy (post, col. 1539). It is your lordships' duty to maintain, as far as you possibly can, the authority of all former decisions of this House; and although later decisions may have interpreted and limited the application of earlier, they ought not (without some unavoidable necessity) to be treated as conflicting. The reasons which learned lords who concurred in a particular decision may have assigned for their opinions, have not the same degree of authority with the decisions themselves. A judgment which is right and consistent with sound principles, upon the facts and circumstances of the case which the House had to decide, need not be construed as laying down a rule for a substantially different state of facts and circumstances, though some propositions, wider than the case itself required, may appear to have received countenance from those who then advised the House. With this preface, I think it right to say that all the three decisions of this House, to which I have referred, appear to me to be capable of being explained and justified upon consistent principles.—p. 275.

LORD WATSON.—The respondents, however, maintained that an easement or right of use, such as their special Act empowers them to take, is not a "hereditament" within the meaning of sect. 3 of the Lands Clauses Act, and, at all events, is not a "hereditament of tenure." As to the first branch of the argument, I confess my inability to understand why the expression "hereditaments" in sect. 3 should not be held to include incorporeal hereditaments. I think it does, and it was so held by the Court of Q. B. in Reg. v. Cambrian Ry., Lord Blackburn observing that "hereditaments," as used in the Act, includes "anything which is the subject of inheritance." That case was overruled in the C. A. in Hopkins v. G. N. Ry., on the ground that the injury to the ferry for which the Court of Q. B. had held the company liable in compensation, was attributable to the user, and not to the construction of the railway. But Mellish, L.J., who delivered the judgment in the C. A., said: "In Reg. v. Cambrian Ry. the judges rely on the clause in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act by which the word 'land' includes 'franchises.' This no doubt proves that if franchises are injured by the construction of the railway or works, which they may be, compensation may be obtained." So that the C. A., in Hopkins v. G. N. Ry., did not differ from, but on the contrary approved of, the decision in Reg. v. Cambrian Ry., in so far as it affirmed that a corporeal hereditament such as a franchise of ferry, is "land" within the meaning of sect. 3, and therefore "land" within the meaning of sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act. In the subsequent case of Hill v. Midland Ry., where the company had power by their special Act to acquire (except in a certain event which had not occurred) a right or easement of precisely the same character as that which the respondent company are authorised to take for the purpose of crossing the appellants' Gloucester line, Fry, J. held that such easement or right was, by reason of its having been made the subject of compulsory acquisition by the provisions of the special Act, brought within the scope of the statutory definition of the word "lands" as occurring in sects. 18 and 85 of the general Act. The only authority to the contrary, which was relied upon by the respondents, was Pinchin v. London and Blackwall Ry. (supra, col. 1506). The observations made by Lord Cranworth in that case are entitled to the greatest respect; but I agree with Cotton, L.J. [in the C. A.] in thinking that these observations were directed to the question whether the word "lands" in sect. 18 of the Lands Clauses Act, apart from any peculiar power conferred by the special Act, includes an easement. What the noble and learned lord, as I understand him, did say, was, that the context of the general Act forbade the application of sect. 18 to "lands" which were not corporeal hereditaments, a proposition which I do not think it necessary to dispute.—pp. 801—803.

[Lord Chelmsford's expression was this:—"The case was argued at your lordships' bar both upon the 6th and 16th sections of the Railways Clauses Act, but in my opinion the 6th section is inapplicable. It relates to owners and occupiers of and all other persons interested in any lands taken and used for the purposes of the railway or injuriously affected by the construction thereof (not in the course of the construction thereof); and the company is to make full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers vested in the company."]

ESHER, M.R.—The chief point argued is this: it was urged that we were bound by authority to hold that if the arbitrator awards any compensation upon such a claim as this for injury, when it is injury only existing during the continuance of the work, and does not confine himself to injury which remains when the work is finished, the award is bad. That has always struck me as an exceedingly strange proposition—that compensation may be given for the injury which exists at the time when the work is finished, and yet that no compensation is to be allowed for the very same injury which exists during the progress of the works. That has always seemed to me to be a very fine distinction, which I could not understand; and when we look into the authorities, we find that it is based on an expression of Lord Chelmsford. I cannot help thinking that that expression, which has been cited from Ricket v. Metropolitan Ry., decided in the H. L., and has been relied upon as an opinion of Lord Chelmsford, is open to the explanation that it is a defective expression; he did not intend to say that which no doubt his words, prima facie, seem to imply. But be that as it may, that expression of his, as has been pointed out, was not adopted by Lord Cranworth in the very same case, and certainly has been spoken of, to say the least, with doubt by Lord Selborne in Caledonian Ry. v. Walker's Trustees (supra, col. 1535). I cannot, therefore, take that expression of Lord Chelmsford's as a binding authority upon this Court as a decision of the H. L. If that be so, we are driven back to principle. As I have said, I cannot believe that a fine drawn distinction which seems to me unreasonable can be the law, and therefore I cannot think that the mere fact that the arbitrator has given some compensation for injury done before the works were completed invalidates the award.—p. 20.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The present case is, however, plainly distinguishable from that of Bush v. Trowbridge Waterworks Co. In the latter case the water company took power to divert only a portion of a brook which flowed through the plaintiff's land, and though the portion abstracted prevented the stream from being of the same practical benefit in the way of irrigation to the plaintiff which it had been before, the brook or stream, though seriously diminished in quantity, continued to run through the land as before, and it is upon this that the judgments of the M.R. and the L.J.J. appeared to have proceeded. In the present case the corporation have taken power to divert the whole body of the stream, and given notice to the plaintiff of their intention to do so, and the case comes within the principle of the decision of Lord Romilly in Ferrand v. Bradford Corporation, which is by no means overruled by or inconsistent with the decision in the case of the Trowbridge Waterworks Co.—p. 107.

Fleming v. Newport Ry. (1883) 8 App. Cas. 265.—H.L. (SC.).

LORD WATSON.—Henderson v. Nimmo and Colquhoun has, therefore, no analogy to the present, because in that case the pursuer's title admittedly conferred upon him an immediate right to access by a street 60 feet wide; and what the Court decided was that his right to that access was not impaired by a transaction entered into, in mala fide, between Nimmo and the superior before the formal title to the pursuer's feu was executed. . . . The compulsory taking of part of the superior's estate cannot in my opinion be regarded as equivalent, either in fact or law, to an exercise of the power reserved by the superior himself. That was virtually decided by the Second Division of the Court, in Solway Ry. v. Jackson.—p. 281.

WILLES, J.—It is not surprising, however, that the alderman should have thought himself justified in the conclusion he arrived at, having regard to Reg. v. London and Southampton Ry., where the Court of Queen's Bench refused a rule to assess compensation under circumstances which at first sight seem similar to those of the present case. In fact, however, the cases differ; for there, before the tenant went out, a transaction took place between the parties which led the Court to the conclusion (whether rightly or wrongly, it is unnecessary to consider), that the tenant had accepted an equivalent or satisfaction for the disturbance of his possession, or that something had passed between them which disentitled the tenant to demand damages by way of compensation. This is what the statement at the end of the judgment appears to amount to, namely, that the tenant consented to remain in after the six months, by way of satisfaction, and that the defendants having, meanwhile, acquired the position of landlords, the notice, under the whole circumstances of the case, had the same effect as if it had been a landlord's notice, and therefore deprived the plaintiffs of a right to compensation. No evidence of any such arrangement is to be discovered in the present case; and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to compensation for the value of his interest whatever it may be.—p. 588.

LORD WATSON.—Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald (supra), does not appear to me to have any application to the circumstances of the present case; and for this reason, that all that was there decided was that the undertaking which the public trustees were there tendering—an undertaking to bind their successors in office in all time to come—was one which the House held to be beyond their power and amounting practically to an abrogation of the rights given to those successors by express statutory enactment. Another question remains behind, which I will not attempt to solve, although Lord Blackburn expressed an opinion favourable to the appellants upon that point, and the English case of Gonty seems to me to point in the same direction.—p. 73.

LORD HERSCHELL.—In my view, without expressing any opinion upon the determination of that case [Gonty's Case], it does not conflict, as has been supposed, with Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald.—p. 74.

Here, having given a notice to treat for the four plots of land, they proceed to summon a jury to assess the value of the fee of one of them only. That I restrain, because the jury summoned must be a jury to assess the value of the whole, and not of any one of them.—p. 309.

JESSEL, M.R.—I have before stated my views in Harper, Ex parte (supra), at great length, and they have been published to the profession; so I will not repeat them, but merely say I still adhere to them. That being so, what is the state of the authorities on the subject? Now it is very much to be regretted that the decision of the C. A. in Chancery [Dare Valley Ry., In re] was not drawn to the attention of the C. P. when they gave the decision now under appeal. Of course that Court would have been bound by the decision of the superior Court. However, it was not done, and that decision was made, like my own in Harper, Ex parte, in ignorance of the existence of any such decision. But really that decision . . . is conclusive on the point, because there it was decided that, inasmuch as the Lands Clauses Act said that the arbitrations under that Act are to be submissions, it is sufficient to show that they are arbitrations by consent within the meaning of the Common Law Procedure Act. Against that decision of the superior Court there is nothing but the two decisions of the Court of C. P. itself, and, therefore, if we are to be guided by authority, we ought to decide contrary to the view expressed by the Court of C. P., and more so, because the decision of the C. A. in Chancery is that of a Court of equal jurisdiction with this Court, though I am far from saying that in every case this Court is bound to follow the decision of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction.—p. 864.

BRETT, L.J.—It seems to me that in Rhodes v. Airedale Drainage Commissioners this Court held that where the promoters and the claimant under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, have agreed to appoint arbitrators, they have agreed to that which is a submission to arbitration within the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 5, and that consequently the arbitrators or umpire have power to state a special case for the opinion of the High Court of Justice. Therefore the Q. B. D. had jurisdiction to hear and decide upon the special case now before us; and it seems to me to follow that their decision was an "order" within the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, s. 19, and that this Court is bound to hear an appeal from it.—p. 425.

JERVIS, C.J.—It seems to me that the words of the Act are plain, and that we may fairly hold that the words "in manner herein provided" in the 68th section incorporate all the previous provisions, as if the company themselves were the moving party. Looking at the language of the 38th and 39th sections, I think it plainly applies to any case of disputed compensation, and that we shall be doing less violence to the words of the legislature in so holding, than if we were to limit them in the way we are called upon by the defendants to do. I quite feel that this view, to a certain extent, conflicts with the decision of the Court of Q. B. in Railstone v. York, &c. Ry. But it is to be observed that was not the unanimous decision of the Court.—p. 167.

BLACKBURN, J.—If the warrant was issued for causing a jury to be summoned the offer which had been made would be the final and conclusive offer, and it would be too late to make another offer afterwards. RIDLEY, J.—In the present case the defendants, who are the promoters, have made an offer, and have done nothing to entitle the plaintiffs to say it has been withdrawn. In Fitzhardinge (Lord) and Gloucester, &c. Co., In re, expressions are to be found in the judgments which seem to show that if in that case the second offer by the promoters had not been made, the first would have been held to be still in existence. The decision in Reg. v. Manley Smith turned upon a different point. It was there held that, inasmuch as the second offer by the promoters was not made under sect. 38 of the Lands Clauses Act, they could not rely upon it as a "sum previously offered" within the meaning of sect. 51.—p. 26.

BRETT, L.J.—Owen v. L. & N. W. Ry. decided two things. First, the ground on which the Courts exercise a jurisdiction in a matter of taxation is that the office of taxing costs is the business of the Court itself: that this office is delegated to one of its officers, and that the Court has, necessarily, jurisdiction to control this delegated authority, and therefore a right to review the master's taxation. Secondly, that although a master of the Court of Q. B. was appointed by the legislature to tax the costs under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the master in the matter of taxation was not acting as master, but as a person designated by the Act, and, moreover, as the proceedings were not proceedings in the Court, there was no jurisdiction to review the taxation. I am of opinion that these two points were rightly decided.—p. 4.

SELBORNE, L.C.—It appears to me that the judgment in Holdsworth v. Wilson may be supported upon an intelligible principle. The costs are not created by taxation, nor is the legal right to recover them created by taxation. The right to recover them is given by the statute, the costs have been actually incurred, and in other cases of costs which are subject to taxation it is not generally a condition precedent of a demand, or of an action brought upon a demand for costs, that the costs should have been taxed. "Settlement" or taxation is merely a mode of determining in a quasi judicial manner, by a ministerial officer of the Court, disputed questions of amount when they arise. The action is founded upon the right; and a demand of that which the party considers himself entitled to has been made. In the action the first question to be determined is, has he the right which he claims or not? If he has, it is possible that there may be no question as to the amount; in that case there will be no need of taxation. But if a question of amount still remains to be determined, the machinery of taxation is convenient; and it is prescribed by the statutes, as subsidiary for the purpose of justice, but not as the foundation of the right. That seems to me to be the principle of the decision in Holdsworth v. Wilson.

•O.C.

I think it is one which cannot be shown to be unsound, although some technical arguments may plausibly be advanced against it; but, it having been so decided, I think your lordships will do wisely not to dissent from that decision.—p. 434.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The point decided there [Metropolitan District Ry. v. Sharpe] was that a person could bring an action under this statute for his costs without going to the taxing master at all; but the decision in that case shows that the taxing master is not to be treated as an ordinary taxing master in an action, but as having a jurisdiction imposed or conferred upon him by the statute, and which, treating him as an inferior Court, he can be compelled to perform either by mandamus, or certiorari, when those are the proper remedies.—p. 854.

LOPES, L.J.—I understand those cases [Owen v. L. & N. W. Ry. and Sandback Charity Trustees and North Staffordshire Ry., In re (supra)] to come to this, that if [under sect. 1 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1869] the master allows costs to one of the parties where the statute does not give them, or disallows them where the statute gives them, the Court has no power to interfere with the taxation on a motion to review, because the master is not acting in the matter ex officio as the officer of the Court, but as a person named by the Act.—p. 855.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—It has been suggested in the course of the argument that the proper course in the present case would have been for the appellants to have brought an action against the churchwardens and guardians for the recovery of their costs in this House. They would then, it is said, have been within the protection of sect. 4 of the [Poor Law (Payment of Debts)] Act of 1859. But it is difficult to see how such an action could lie. The grounds of convenience which induced this House in Metropolitan District Ry. v. Sharpe to follow the decision of the Ex. Ch. in Holdsworth v. Wilson (supra, col. 1551), would not have any application. The Supreme Court cannot sit in review on the H. L. The officers of the Supreme Court are not competent to deal with costs in this House. It seems to me that the certificate of the Clerk of the Parliaments must be a condition precedent to an action at law for the recovery of costs in the H. L. I do not think that Metropolitan District Ry. v. Sharpe can be regarded as an authority to the contrary.—p. 206.

BRETT, M.R.—At the time Edmundson, In re, was decided, the working of the Lands Clauses Act had not become so well known as it is now. If it had been that case would, I think, have been decided differently. The time, I think, has now come when, upon the invitation of the Div. Court which decided the present case, we ought, as I for one am prepared to do, to say that Edmundson, In re, was wrongly decided.—p. 593.

BRAMWELL and BRETT, L.JJ. discussed G. W. Ry. v. May. See judgments.

COTTON, L.J.—At first sight City of Glasgow Union Ry. v. Caledonian Ry. may appear to support the argument for the defendants, but that case really turned upon the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act as to lands purchased for extraordinary purposes, which are very similar to those contained in sects. 12 and 13 of the English Act. No doubt some remarks are made in the judgments delivered in the H. L. which appear to favour the contention for the defendants, but it must be recollected that they were uttered with reference to the facts before the House, and that it was intended to point out that lands purchased by agreement for extraordinary purposes do not vest in adjoining owners: I cannot think that it was intended to lay down that lands which might have been taken compulsorily cannot become superfluous if they have been conveyed to the company pursuant to an agreement. . . . If the railway company had after the expiration of the ten years put up the land for sale as superfluous land, that circumstance would, in my opinion, be almost decisive against them; and this seems to have been the view of Lord Blackburn in Moody v. Corbett; and if circumstances which tell against a railway company may be looked at, in like manner those may be considered which seem to be in their favour.—pp. 286, 287.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I wish to say that in the judgment which I pronounced in Hooper v. Bourne (supra), I intended to intimate my entire concurrence with the decision in G. W. Ry. v. May. I think that in that case the H. L. laid down a correct principle for determining what are superfluous lands.—p. 186.

BRETT, L.J.—The question, which we have to determine, seems to me to depend upon the principle, which in Hooper v. Bourne we considered to be the result of G. W. Ry. v. May. It follows that we must consider whether upon the last day of the ten years if all the facts had been known it could have been foreseen that, owing to the ordinary development of the railway or neighbourhood, the land would within a reasonable time be required for the purposes of the undertaking.—p. 190.

COTTON, L.J.—The decision at which we arrived in Hooper v. Bourne was entirely consistent with the decision in G. W. Ry. v. May. The principle laid down by the H. L. in that case was of course binding upon us, and we intended to follow it. When Lord Cairns spoke of a survey being made at the end of the ten years, for the purpose of determining what land at that moment was superfluous, he did not mean that the officers of the railway were then to make a survey, and to decide whether the land was required for the purposes of the undertaking: for it is obvious that their decision would in no way be binding: what in my opinion Lord Cairns meant, was that the expiration of the ten years is the period to which the tribunal is to look, when it has to decide whether the land in dispute is superfluous; and the tribunal may take notice of facts which have since become known for the purpose of deciding, whether it could then have been foreseen, that according to the ordinary development of the railway and the neighbourhood, the land would be required for the purposes of the railway within a reasonable time after the expiration of that period.—p. 192.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In that case [Carington (Lord) v. Wycombe Ry.] the land was obviously land not required for the purposes of the railway company; and in that case there was no such element as we have to deal with here—that is to say, an Act of Parliament compelling the railway company to part with the land. With regard to Hobbs v. Midland Ry. I think the view taken by Manisty, J. was right—that if a railway company sells land before the prescribed period has expired, prima facie that raises an inference that the company does not require the land for the purpose of the railway; but that that does not relieve the Court from the necessity of enquiring whether the land is in fact required or not. If the Court finds, as Manisty, J. found in Hobbs v. Midland Ry., that the land is required, and has nevertheless been sold by an ultra vires proceeding, it ought not to infer from the sale itself, what is contrary to the fact, that the land is superfluous land. Therefore I think that that decision was perfectly right, and that the principle upon which the decision proceeded was also perfectly right. Kekewich, J. thought that Carington (Lord) v. Wycombe Ry. was opposed to Hobbs v. Midland Ry.; but, in my opinion it is clearly distinguishable from that case, and also from this case.—p. 180.

LORD SHAND.—In Blackmore's Case it is to be observed in the first place that sect. 121 [Lands Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845] was the section with which the Court had to deal, and not the section [sect. 120] with which we are here concerned. In the next place, it appears that in that case both parties were agreed that the land was superfluous, whereas here we have the parties directly in controversy upon that subject; and in the third place it appears that in the case of Blackmore not only had the directors taken the view that the land was superfluous—from which, indeed, they did not depart in the litigation—but in point of fact they had gone on and actually sold the land. In these circumstances it appears to me that that case can be of no authority for the present case; and I agree . . . that the Lord Ordinary was attached rather too great importance to the use of the word "stamping" in the judgment of Lord Westbury, which probably was an expression which may be said to have been a little stronger than the case required, and which is inapplicable to the circumstances here in considering the effect of a different section of the statute.—p. 66.

ELDON, L.C.—Lord Hardwicke [in Pope v. Curl] says:—"Another objection has been made by the defendant's counsel, that where a man writes a letter it is in the nature of a gift to the receiver; but I am of opinion that it is only a special property in the receiver; possibly the property of the paper may belong to him; but this does not give a license to any person whatsoever to publish them to the world." If he had stopped there, doubt might have been entertained whether the receiver was not at liberty to publish them to the world, but he proceeds, "for, at most, the receiver has only a joint property with the writer." No one can read Thompson v. Stanhope without seeing that this was understood at that time to be the doctrine of the Court. . . . Now I say, that, if in the case before the V.C. [Perceval v. Phipps], Lady Perceval had given to Phipps a right to publish her letters, this case is the converse of that; and that the defendant, if he previously had it, has renounced the right of publication.—pp. 425, 426, 427.

CAIRNS, L.C.—A case of Crawshaw v. Homfray was cited, in which there was an additional element in the course of business. There a wharfinger was in the habit of receiving goods upon which he might have had a lien, but the course of business was that he parted with the goods from time to time, receiving payment at the end of every six months or every year for all his dues, and it was held that that course of business prevented him from maintaining his right of lien. If it had been the course of business here for the respondent, not merely to effect these policies, but from time to time to give them up as they were effected, and simply to stand upon his right to be paid at the end of the month, then I can understand that the case would be like that I have cited.—p. 413.

BLACKBURN, J.—Doe v. Rock is confusedly reported; but it would seem that the owners of the legal fee had held it as trustees for Woolrich, who had purchased it from them but failed to pay the price; then Woolrich sold his equitable fee to Butler, at an advanced price. It would seem probable from the report in Carrington & Marshman that Butler actually paid the original price to the owners of the fee, and that they became trustees for him only, and that afterwards by some arrangement, not explained in the report, Woolrich became tenant at will to Butler, not to his trustees, except in so far as by implication every trustee may be said to be trustee for those who hold under his immediate cestui que trust. This understood, the ruling of Patteson, J., after consulting Cresswell, J., was in truth no more in effect than that where the cestui que trust would be barred if his title was legal, his trustee is also barred, a doctrine which in no way comes in question here, and which has since been acted upon in Melling v. Leuk (supra).—p. 25.

BAGGALLAY, L.J. (for the Court).—The case with which Lord Redesdale was dealing was not between cestui que trust and trustee in respect of a breach of an express trust committed by such trustee, but between cestui que trust and a third party, whom it was proposed to treat as a constructive trustee by reason of dealings between himself and the express trustee.—p. 124.

KEKEWICH, J.—But the mortgage deed contains the policy of insurance, and the question arises whether, as regards this policy also, the right to redeem is gone. I am asked to say that it is gone* mainly on the ground that the Court ought to apply the analogy of the statute; and reference has been made to the well-known judgment of Lord Redesdale in Hovenden v. Annesley (Lord), where he accepts the application of the analogy. . . . If I were to attempt to apply the statute by analogy, I should be doing something quite different from what Lord Redesdale did. . . . What Lord Redesdale said was substantially this: that, where a statute does not purport to bind equitable interests, it cannot be applied directly to such interests, but the Court will apply it by analogy, and so in dealing with equitable interests will treat itself as bound by the statute, which in terms only touches legal interests. It seems to me to be very difficult from that to argue that a statute which applies to land shall be applied by analogy to a policy of assurance. I do not see my way to act upon any such principle.—p. 3.

GIFFARD, V.-C.—In opposition to this view i.e. the view taken by the judges who decided Dunne v. Doran and Brereton v. Hutchinson, that an executor could set up the Statute of Limitations against a claim founded on a breach of trust by his testator, there are in this country the dicta, at all events, of three eminent judges in three different cases. In Baker v. Martin the V.-C. of England said: "The testator was in the situation of a trustee for the creditors of the bankrupt; how, then, can the lapse of time, either in his lifetime or since his death, affect the debt?" In Story v. Gape the present Wood, L.J., then V.-C., said: "The Statute of Limitations, of course, never can be set up in a question in this Court between a trustee and cestui que trust. If this were a simple contract debt or a specialty debt of the testator, the executor could plead in the one case six years' limitation, in the other case (if such a space of time had elapsed) twenty years. But in the case of a breach of trust he cannot plead the statute, for his testator could not; he must answer as his testator would have had to answer." And in Obee v. Bishop, Turner, L.J., said: "With respect to the general personal estate, I am of opinion that it would be most dangerous to hold that a demand against the assets of a deceased trustee or personal representative, in respect of a breach of trust or misappropriation committed by him, is barred at the expiration of six years from his death. Courts of equity, in dealing with equitable debts, are not bound by the Statute of Limitations, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16; and although they have in many instances adopted a rule grounded on an analogy to that statute, they do not extend that analogy to demands arising out of breaches of trust." It is needless to observe, that though this Court is not bound by the decisions in Ireland, it would always treat them as, and feel them to be, of the greatest weight. After much consideration, however, I have felt myself unable to follow them; for I think that the dicta, I may almost say in two of the cases the decisions, of the eminent judges in this country, which I have quoted, are founded on sounder principles.—p. 382.

BYRNE, J.—In Spickernell v. Hotham the covenant was to transfer certain new 4l. per cent. annuities to trustees to hold upon certain trusts; and Wood, V.-C., held that as the trust fund never had any existence, he could not assume that a person had been paying himself the interest of a non-existing fund—that is, the trust security never came into existence. In Stone v. Stone no trust fund or security had ever come into existence, and it was held that the contract was simply a legal obligation barred by lapse of time. These cases seem to me to be distinguishable from the present.—p. 692. And see Rorke v. Sherlock (1877) Ir. R. 9 Eq. 510.—V.C.

- LINDLEY, L.J.—In Bowden, in re, Andrew v. Cooper, FRY, L.J. said with reference to this clause [Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8, sub-s. 1, cl. (a)], "It is obvious that, if a person had not been a trustee, he could not be sued for a breach of trust: and, further, that there is no right or privilege that I am aware of, conferred by any statute of limitations in respect of a breach of trust. Therefore, I should have great difficulty in applying that sub-section to the present case." The case before the L.J. was an action by a new trustee against an old trustee to compel him to make good trust funds, which he had misapplied. The L.J. was right in saying that no action or other proceeding could be taken by such a plaintiff against such a defendant if there had been no trust. But, although I share with FRY, L.J., the difficulty presented by clause (a), I cannot avoid the conclusion that to exclude the operation of clause (a) in all cases on the short ground stated by him, would be really to deprive it of all meaning whatever. I cannot think that FRY, L.J. intended to go so far as that. The legislature appears to have assumed that there might be cases in which, if there were no trust, some action or proceeding might be taken by the plaintiff against the defendant, and to which some statute of limitations might be a defence.—p. 834.

CAIRNS, L.C.—It was decided, and the decision has always been followed and never quarrelled with since, in Hodge v. Churchyard, that a devise of land to pay a sum of money to A. B., was a charge, and was not a trust for A. B. And, my lords, the word "pay" surely cannot mean more than the words "well and truly paying," and the words "well and truly pay" must mean simply on condition of well and truly paying; and therefore, it being established law that a devise to A., "paying," a sum of money to B. is not a trust, but is a charge, "it must also be the law that a devise to A. to well and truly pay" to B. is not a trust, but is a charge; and a devise to A., "on the condition of well and truly paying," must be a charge and not a trust.—p. 989.

LORD O'HAGAN, who concurred as to Hodge v. Churchyard, said: Great reliance was placed in the Court below, and a good deal here also by the respondents, upon an Irish case, which is very well known and very generally accepted, Dillon v. Cruise, before Lord Plunket. That case was rightly decided, but it appears to me to have been wholly different from the case before your lordships, and in contrast with it; it appears to me to illustrate and establish the true doctrine of the law on the other side. It takes precisely the distinction on which I have endeavoured to insist between a charge and an express trust, and it indicates the conditions necessary to the creation of the latter. . . . So in Thomson v. Eastwood ((1877) 2 App. Cas. 215.—H.L. (IR.)) . . . there was an express trust beyond all controversy. . . . There we have a trustee eo nomine—we have a trustee in terms, and we have a trustee in effect, but here, on the contrary, though as to the annuity there may be a charge, there is no trustee eo nomine, there is no declaration that he takes the land for the special purpose of carrying out the trust, and no direction that from it the trust shall be worked out and satisfied.—p. 996.

LORD SELBORNE, who also concurred, agreed as to Hodge v. Churchyard and distinguished Dillon v. Cruise.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—Hindmarsh, in re, depends upon the special facts disclosed in the report, and, in my opinion, the demurrer could not be justified if it had been a simple case of a person holding funds expressly for a particular purpose, and having the duty cast upon him of holding them for the benefit of the person who intrusted him with them. In such a case of agency I apprehend it could not be said that the Statute of Limitations was applicable. I do not say that in every case in which a bill might be filed against an agent the Statute of Limitations would not apply, but in all cases where the bill is filed against an agent on the ground of his being in a fiduciary relation, I think it would be right to say that the Statute has no application.—p. 240.

CHITTY, J.—I take Lord Cairns' speech in Cunningham v. Foot (col. 1569). He says (p. 984): "The land must be vested in a trustee upon an express trust, and then the right of the cestui que trust to bring an action in the manner pointed out by the 25th section. There must be a trustee in whom the land is vested; there must be an 'express trust,' by which I understand the legislature to mean a trust which arises upon the construction of the written instrument, not upon any inference of law imposing a trust upon the conscience; a trust arising upon the words of the instrument itself." Applying this to the present case, it cannot be said that all that can be found in the construction of this instrument, for it is plain that no valid trust was created. The speech of Lord Cairns in 1878 was subsequent to Kindersley, V.-C.'s well-known exposition in Petre v. Petre (col. 1568) which has often been deservedly quoted. Then I pass to L.J. (then Mr. J.) Kay's dictum in Bannerv. Bertridge (col. 1570) in 1881. After quoting the V.-C.'s judgment, the learned judge proceeded to state that he did not think that exhaustive. He says at p. 263: "It probably refers to express trusts of land only, which must be in writing." Then he goes on to deal with cases of personal estate. That the V.-C. did not deal with personal estate is explained by the fact that he had only to deal with real estate under sect. 25; that is clear from the judgment of Kay, L.J. Then in Soar v. Ashwell, the late Bowen, L.J., after saying that an express trust can only arise between the cestui que trust and his trustee, and that a constructive trust is to be only made out by circumstances, proceeds to say: "It is not unreasonable in the latter class of cases, where the liability of a stranger to the trust arises from his conduct and depends on the proof of his contemporary acts, that time should run in favour of the person to be charged. In such cases conflicts of evidence are possible or probable, and to deny to the person to be charged the shelter or benefit of a period of limitation would be obviously dangerous and unjust." An excellent exposition of the grounds on which the statute makes a special exception in favour of express trusts, the existence of which can be proved by evidence in a simple and satisfactory way, and not left to a conflict of testimony and, as in the present case, to a conflict as to the meaning and effect of acts done considerably more than one hundred years ago. This case illustrates the proposition of Bowen, L.J. Then he deals with the various cases which have occurred, showing that there may be a difficulty in fixing the line of demarcation between express and constructive trusts, and then mentions Life Association of Scotland v. Siddal. That case does not form an exception to the principle of express trusts. It was there held that where a trust of land was duly constituted by writing, and a person assumed to act as trustee under a colour of title in regard to the land, there was an express trust within sect. 25, and therefore the person could not escape it being said, "You were trustee under that document." That case does not conflict with the other authorities, but stands on a sound footing of its own.—p. 194.

STIRLING, J.—The defendant there [Burdick v. Garrick] was a solicitor, and the fund in respect of which the suit was instituted was entrusted to him, not for the purpose of being remitted when received to the principal, but for the purpose of being employed in a particular manner, in the purchase of land or stock, so that there was much more in that case than the ordinary case of sums of money received for the principal. That case, however, was commented on by Hall, V.-C., in Watson v. Woodman (col. 1570), where he expressed his opinion that the case was decided on the special circumstances. The recent case of Soar v. Ashwell was also relied on; but in that case the plaintiff's claim was of such a nature as could only be asserted in a court of equity, and this is pointed out by the M.R. at the commencement of his judgment.—p. 744.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—When I consider that the words of the statute of 31 Eliz. c. 5, do not include an action by a common informer, I confess I prefer the authority in the Ex. Ch. of Calliford v. Blawford, and the construction there put upon the statute in the time of Lord Holt to that in the time of Geo. 3 in Lookup v. Frederick, and the subsequent case of Dyer v. Best.—p. 471.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The statute of 31 Eliz. c. 5, first limits the action of the Queen to two years, and then all qui tam actions to one year, and, as the L.J. has pointed out, very shortly after the Act it was held that it did not extend to the action of a common informer who was not suing qui tam. That seems to have been dissented from in another case, and in the more recent case of Dyer v. Best, the Court of Ex. held that 31 Eliz. c. 5, extends to a common informer, although he is not suing in a qui tam action. I must confess there appears to me to be a great deal of force in the reasons given in the judgment in Dyer v. Best, in support of what was there held; but, assuming that to be law, it is impossible to say that the Goldsmiths' Company [the present plaintiffs] are in the position of common informers.—p. 474.

KEKEWICH, J.—I looked at Robinson v. Currey, but, though there is a good deal about the party grieved, it does not really touch the exact point with which I now have to deal. I do, however, find that the learned judges in the C. A. who heard that case all of them referred to penalties throughout as if they regarded the statute as dealing with only penalties or damages in the nature of penalties. That seems to me to be the right construction.—p. 729.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is said that this is not an action on the case, but an action on the statute [Limitation Act, 1623], and Cork and Bandon Ry. v. Goode is relied on for that proposition. But it is to be remembered that that was an action for a statutory debt, and the sole question there was whether that debt was within the terms of the Limitation Act, 1623, founded on specialty or not. It does not seem to me that the decision in that case really is material to the case that we have here to decide. Maule, J., in that case points out that there is a difference between an action which is given by a statute and an action on the statute. The action in that case was, as I have pointed out, an action of debt on a statute. The present case, it seems to me, is a case of a new duty created of accuracy in respect of the preparation and issue of prospectuses, and an action on the case given to those persons who are injured by the breach of the duty.—p. 341.

HULLOCK, B.—In that case, surveyors of a road had undermined a wall, which did not fall until more than three months had elapsed, within which time, by the statute 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 81, actions must be commenced for anything done or acted in pursuance of the Act. The action was not commenced until the wall had fallen, and it was contended that the action was too late, because the act done was the undermining of the wall. The Court of K. B., however, decided (I shall say with great submission, most properly, and the principle can hardly be controverted), that the gravamen of the action (in the language of the learned lord who at that time presided in that Court), did not commence until the falling of the wall. I am quite aware that in a case in the Court of C. P., of Sutton v. Clarke (1 Marsh. 429; 6 Taunt. 29, n.), Gibbs, C.J., did, in one part of the argument, say that he thought he should have had great difficulty, as one of the members of the Court, to have acceded to that decision; he said it was a strong case. But I think it may be collected from the subsequent observations in the remaining part of the report, that the learned judge did recognise the decision, and seemed to think no other decision, under the circumstances, should be come to. Assuming that it was a sound one, which it appears to me to be, it goes a long way to show that you cannot sustain this action for the several injuries which occurred at the different intervals during the last two years, but are confined to the injuries sustained during the six months preceding the commencement of the action.—p. 73.

DENMAN, C.J.—In Baillie v. Inchiquin (Lord) it was certainly held by Lord Kenyon that a letter from the defendant, referring the creditor to his trustee, was a sufficient acknowledgment. But *Whippy v. DENMAN, C.J.—Yea v. Fouraker is acknowledged as an authority in Thornton v. Illingworth. But the judges distinguish it from that case. Yea v. Fouraker was rightly decided, if, as Bayley and Holroyd, JJ., lay it down in the subsequent case, the Statute of Limitations takes effect upon the ground, that after a certain time it shall be presumed that the debt has been discharged. For, if that be so, an acknowledgment made at any time will rebut that presumption. But in Tanner v. Smart, the earlier cases were revised, and the doctrine as to presumption of payment repudiated; and it was held that, to prevent the operation of the statute, a distinct promise was necessary.—p. 575.

COTTON, L.J.—Something was said in argument about an expression used by Lord Blackburn in Morgan v. Rowlands that the acknowledgment must be such that a promise may be inferred in fact and not merely implied in law. There was a discussion as to what that meant. In my opinion it is not necessary for the present purpose to decide that; but what I think the learned judge must have meant was this, that an acknowledgment is not sufficient if it merely admits a state of circumstances from which a promise to pay would be implied by law, as, for instance, when goods are sent to a man at his request, without any express contract, and the law implies an obligation to pay. What I think we must find from the writing is not merely an acknowledgment of such a state of circumstances as will throw a duty upon the writer to pay, but words of such a character that you may reasonably infer from the words a promise to pay. It may be put in this way, that on a fair construction of the language there must be an acknowledgment of the claim as one which is to be paid by the writer.—p. 478.

BOWEN, L.J.—It is clearly settled that to take a case out of the statute there must be an acknowledgment or a promise to pay, and that where there is a clear acknowledgment that the debt is due from the person giving that acknowledgment a promise to pay will be inferred. That was laid down by Lord Tenterden in Tanner v. Smart (supra), and the proposition, as Kelly, C.B. said in Quincey v. Sharpe (supra), has never been disputed, and it has been re-stated over and over again in all the Courts. Now, first of all, the acknowledgment must be clear in order to raise the implication of a promise to pay. . . . Secondly, supposing there is an acknowledgment of a debt which would, if it stood by itself be clear enough, still, if words are found combined with it which prevent the possibility of the implication of the promise to pay arising, then the acknowledgment is not clear within the meaning of the definition; because, not merely is there found in the words something that expresses less than a promise to pay (which, as Lord Bramwell pointed out in Lee v. Wilmut (supra, col. 1577), will not necessarily put an end to the implication of the promise to pay), but because the words express the lesser in such a way as to exclude the greater.—p. 479. FRY, L.J. concurred.

ABINGER, C.B.—The decision in Lloyd v. Maund amounted to no more than this, that the judge was wrong in the interpretation he put upon the letter given in evidence, and therefore he should have left it to the jury.—p. 405.

PARKE, B.—I have always acted on that authority in the case of an obscure and doubtful document, but I have always disapproved it. The course I have taken is, to express my own opinion, and then to take that of the jury, in order that, if they differed with me, the opinion of the Court might be fairly taken on the question whether the document should be left to the jury. But if I am called upon to give an opinion, I think Lloyd v. Maund is not law.—p. 406.

LYNDHURST, L.C.—[His lordship read the report in Precedents in Chancery, 385, and observed that on two points, at least, the doctrine there laid down could not now be supported; for it was there said that a direction in a will for payment of debts was sufficient to revive debts that had been previously barred: and that, in addition to an acknowledgment of the debt being still due, a promise to pay it was necessary in order to frustrate a plea of the statute.] I therefore hold the authority of Andrews v. Brown to be of very little weight.—p. 270.

ABBOTT, J.—If it were necessary in this case to overrule Jackson v. Fairbank, I should require further time to consider it, although I am by no means satisfied that that was a sound or good decision. This case is, however, not precisely the same as that. The proof there under the commission of bankruptcy was of the same instrument upon which the action was afterwards brought. Here it is not so. The proof here is of a claim for goods sold and delivered, and the bill of exchange is only incidentally introduced. Now there is a material distinction between a case where the instrument is the ground of the claim, and where it is, as here, only incidentally introduced. Where it is the ground of the claim, it is the interest both of the bankrupt and his assignees to attend to it, and to examine into the circumstances under which it is produced. But in the other case it is not so necessary: for the introduction or omission of it does not increase or diminish the sum on which the dividends are payable. There being this distinction between this case and Jackson v. Fairbank, and not being willing to extend that case any further, I am of opinion that the plaintiff in this case must be nonsuited.—p. 470.

ABBOTT, C.J.—The evidence was, a payment of interest by Robert Tredgold in his own right. Whitecomb v. Whiting was relied upon to show that such payment would take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. It is not necessary to say whether that case, which is contrary to a former decision in Ventris, would be sustained, if reconsidered; but I am warranted in saying, by what fell from Lord Ellenborough in Brandram v. Wharton, that it ought not to be extended. The payment was by one of several originally liable. Here we are called upon to go further, and say, that a payment by one of several, liable alieno jure, shall raise an implied promise by them all. Such a decision would introduce great difficulty in administering the affairs of testators. . . . The inconvenience and hardship arising from such a liability satisfies me that the principle of Whitecomb v. Whiting ought not to be extended to this case.—p. 28.

CAMPBELL, C.J.—I am of opinion the time has come when Willis v. Newham must be overruled. The question upon this record is, the action being brought on a promissory note, whether an entry in the account book of the defendant in her writing, by which there is a statement that she has paid interest upon the promissory note within six years, be evidence to go to the jury to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. It was held by the learned judge who tried this case, in deference to that decision, that it was not. . . . If we say, as we feel bound to do, that Willis v. Newham was improperly decided, we hold that the evidence rejected ought to have been submitted to the jury.—p. 240.

STIRLING, J.—It was said that the acknowledgment or promise was by one of several executors, and that it was necessary in order to take the case out of the statute, that it should be by all. These cases respectively deal with a verbal acknowledgment or promise by one of several executors previously to Lord Tenterden's Act.—p. 632.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Field, J. in Gibbs v. Guild went a little too far when he said that the 26th section [of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27] expressed the whole doctrine of equity applicable to concealed fraud. As between such persons as vendor and purchaser, where the maxim of caveat emptor applies, the observations of the learned judge were not open to criticism that I know of. I am not aware that there is any difference between law and equity in a case of that kind, but the learned judge was not correct in applying that limitation to partners. What right has a partner to say, "You ought not to have trusted me. You were bound to look at the books and see that I was not cheating you"? Such a doctrine as that is unfounded. I am not expressing any new view of the law, for the doctrine will be found very well put in the leading case of Hawkins v. Wickham [(1859) 28 L. J. Ch. 188; 3 De G. & J. 304; 7 W. R. 145].—pp. 643, 644.

RIGBY, L.J.—I think we ought to take the law in Gibbs v. Guild, so far as it is applicable to this case, from the C. A., and not from the judgment of Field, J. in the Court below. *The judges of the C. A. proved entirely upon what I have always understood to be the old law, that time runs against one in the Court of Equity from the time when the concealed fraud has been discovered. I agree with what Lindley, L.J. has said about Raoulins v. Wickham.—p. 645.

CHANNELL, J.—In Grant v. Ellis it was held that ordinary rent reserved on a demise is not within this section [sect. 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833]. The decision in that case apparently proceeded upon two grounds. Rolfe, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, substantially adopted the argument of the defendant, which he summed up in the following passage: "The defendant, on the other hand, contends that this is not a case within the statute at all. He contends that the word 'rent' in the 2nd section of the statute cannot be taken as having any reference to rents such as that now in question, namely, rents reserved on leases for years by contract between the parties, as the conventional equivalent for the right of occupation; but must be confined to rents existing as an inheritance distinct from the land, and for which before the statute a party entitled might have had an assize, such as ancient rent service, fee farm rents, or the like. We accede to this latter view of the case." One of the grounds of that decision is that rent reserved on such a lease is merely the conventional equivalent of the right of occupation. The other ground is that "rent" in the section means rent existing as an inheritance distinct from the land. I do not think that it was the intention of the learned judge to lay stress on the word "inheritance," and that he is to be understood as meaning that an annual sum carved out of the land and made property, though not an inheritance, distinct from the land, would not be rent within the section. The word "inheritance" is used because the persons engaged in the case were talking about inheritance.

If the sum here in question is property distinct from the land, even though by an anomaly it is personal property, the reasoning of that case applies to it just as if it were real property. The plaintiff's right to this periodical sum is therefore a right to "rent" within the meaning of the section.—p. 559. BUCKNILL, J. concurred.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Corpus Christi College v. Rogers. . . was relied upon at the bar, as an authority for the proposition that in a case of this kind, when there is either a surrender by operation of law on the acceptance of a new lease, or a surrender and the grant of a new lease by one and the same deed, a right of action does not accrue for want of an "appreciable moment of time between the grant and the surrender." I am not sure that I entirely understand the view which was taken on the occasion by Bramwell, L.J.; but the judgment of Lord Coleridge appears to me to have proceeded upon the particular facts of that case, which were altogether different from the present. The Statute of Limitations was then set up against the college, the superior landlord, not by a trespasser or disseisor, but by an under-tenant of the lessee, to whom the land in question had been let by the lessee in 1818 under a written agreement for a yearly tenancy at 7s. 6d. a year. This under-tenant regularly paid his rent to the lessee till 1853, and the lease, which was current when the rent was last paid, was renewed by the college to the lessee in 1857, four years afterwards. By the statute 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 6, it is provided that on a surrender by a lessee, and a grant of a new lease, the under-lessees shall hold and enjoy as if the original leases out of which the respective underleases are derived, had been still kept on foot and continued. When this renewal in 1857 took place nothing had been done, notwithstanding the four years' arrear of rent, to put an end to the tenancy of the under-lessee by notice to quit or otherwise; and the college, whose tenant he was not, and to whom his possession was not adverse, had (as I conceive) no right of action against him. The lease which was surrendered on the renewal of 1857 would have continued (if there had been no renewal) till 1870; the renewed lease itself continued till 1877; and the college brought its action in 1878. The section of the Statute of Limitations which the under-tenant relied upon was not, as in this case, the 2nd, read in connection with the 3rd and 5th, but was the 8th, namely, that applicable to tenancies from year to year, when the rent has for twenty years remained unpaid. Corpus Christi College v. Rogers is, in my opinion, no authority for the proposition which it was cited to establish.—p. 742. LORD WATSON concurred.

ROMER, L.J.—If the mortgage be an existing one and was executed before the commencement of the possession of the person claiming to have acquired a title by such possession under the Statute of Limitations, then the statute 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 28 undoubtedly applies in favour of the mortgagee, although the person in possession may have acquired a good title as against the mortgagor and those claiming under the mortgagor—see Thornton v. France, a decision of the C. A. where the earlier authorities are considered.—p. 555.

KEKEWICH, J.—I consider that in his long and carefully-considered judgment Lord Langdale did lay down a principle applicable to a case of this kind quite independently of the case before him, though he applied it to that case. I understand the principle which he lays down to be this: that in order to apply the Statute of Limitations to a particular case you must find a person liable to pay and a person liable to receive the interest, i.e., two different persons, and that when he speaks of an assignable person, to use his own expression, or the person entitled to the interest, he does not necessarily mean the person legally entitled to claim it from the tenants by virtue of the ownership of the legal estate. In the same way he does not refer to the person who is bound to pay as the legal owner of the estate charged, but he means that when the interest beneficially belongs to the same person, who would suffer if the interest were paid, that is to say, from whose income the payment would be a deduction, the statute cannot apply.—p. 611.

COTTON, L.J.—The case is quite different from Sutton v. Sutton, where it was sought to sue the mortgagor on the covenant in his mortgage deed, where the remedy against the land was barred by the statute. The debt there was one and the same debt, and we held that the words of the section must have full effect given to them, and that the debt could not be recovered from the mortgagor personally, any more than out of the land. Fry, L.J. extended this rule to the case where the bond was a separate instrument [Fearnside v. Flint]. Those cases appear to me to have no application to a case where a bond is given by another person conditioned to be void if the mortgagor pays the mortgage debt, and where the mortgage is still alive. If the remedy on the bond taken by itself was barred, I am of opinion that no payment by the mortgagor would keep it alive, but where a bond which by itself is not barred, is given for the purpose of guaranteeing the payment by the mortgagor of the mortgage debt, and the mortgagor makes payments which prevent the remedy on the mortgage from being barred, I am of opinion that the remedy on the bond is not barred. The decision in Cockrill v. Sparkes (supra, col. 1582) is not inconsistent with this. There were in that case two makers of a joint and several promissory note, and it was decided that under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 14, a part payment by one did not take the case out of the Statute of Limitations as against the other. I do not think that this applies where a separate bond is given by sureties to guarantee the payment of a mortgage debt, and the mortgagor makes payments.—p. 295.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—That decision [Sutton v. Sutton] is binding on us, no doubt; but how does it hamper the case of a debt which, though charged on land, is not a specialty debt, but a simple contract debt? No question as to the six years' Statute of Limitations arose in Sutton's Case from first to last. It was argued that the conclusion contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs follows from the judgments of Jessel, M.R. and Bowen, L.J. in Sutton v. Sutton, and it was sought to apply those judgments to simple contract debts by reading passages which had no application thereto extracted from them relating to matters which were not before the Court. Sutton v. Sutton is not an authority, nor anything approaching an authority, compelling us to hold that the limit of six years in bringing an action on a simple contract debt has been abolished, even though the debt be charged on land. Of the other cases cited, Toplis v. Baker and Brocklehurst v. Jessop show that before the Real Property Limitation Acts the action on the debt might be barred in six years, although the remedy against the land was not; and in Stephens, In re, Warburton v. Stephens, Kay, J., so far from holding that the statute of James I had been abrogated by that of Will. 4, recognised the former statute as still outstanding, and showed that that case was outside its provisions. Then there is Firth v. Slingsby, a decision of Stirling, J., with every word of which I agree. He expressly deals with the point, that the statute of James I. is still in force, and, not by way of a dictum, but as the foundation of his judgment, holds that it is.—p. 505.

LORD MACNAGHTEN (for self, SIR B. PEACOCK and SIR R. COUCH).—There is no direct authority on the point in this country. But such authority as there is seems to be opposed to the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court. It is sufficient to refer to McDonnell v. McKinty, Lord St. Leonards' Real Property Statutes, p. 31, and Smith v. Lloyd. In the latter case, which was decided in 1854, Parke, B., in giving the judgment of the Court, says: "We are clearly of opinion that the statute applies, not to want of actual possession by the plaintiff, but to cases where he has been out of, and another in, possession for the prescribed time. There must be both absence of possession by the person who has the right, and actual possession by another, whether adverse or not, to be protected, to bring the case within the statute. We entirely concur in the judgment of Blackburne, C.J. in McDonnell v. McKinty, and the principle on which it is founded." Their lordships have only to add that, in their opinion, there is no difference in principle as regards the application of the statute between the case of mines and the case of other land where the fact of possession is more open and notorious.—p. 799.

LINDLEY, L.J.—That section [sect. 34 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833] does not confer a statutory title against everybody upon the person in whose favour the statute has run, although it does as against those persons whose rights are barred by the statute. This was pointed out by Martin, B. in Anstee v. Nelms, where he said that "the Statute of Limitations can never be so construed that a person claiming a life estate under a will shall enter, and then say that such possession was unlawful, so as to give his heir a right against the remainderman." This was approved as good sense and good law in Board v. Board. . . . Board v. Board is, in my opinion, clearly in point, and clearly right. Whether Kernaghan v. McNally did not go too far it is not necessary to consider. I have great difficulty in reconciling it with Sir E. Sugden's previous decision in Scott v. Neon (supra, col. 1589). Paine v. Jones is intelligible, having regard to the facts of that case. The widow, who had entered as tenant for life under a will which did not pass the lands in question, was allowed by the Court (under circumstances which do not appear) to exclude them from a conveyance to new trustees, and she was allowed to keep possession of them after it had been ascertained that she had no right to them. But I am not satisfied of the soundness of the distinction drawn by Malins, V.-C. between cases of persons having no title under a will, because it does not purport to include the lands they claim, although they believe that it does, and persons claiming under a will which purports to deal with land to which the testator had no title, although they thought he had. No doubt a person may by mistake treat himself as tenant for life of property of which he is himself the owner, and such a mistake can be set right unless he has so acted as to render a rectification of the mistake unjust to others. But the distinction drawn by the V.-C., although it would include such a case, goes much further, and unless restricted it seems to me likely to lead to error. That case, which is the one principally relied upon by the defendants, is not really an authority for them, owing to its peculiar facts. Nor is the passage read from Sir G. Jessel's judgment in Stringer's Estate, In re. What he was objecting to was the extension of the doctrine of estoppel to tenants for life who do not dispute their testators' title, but who do dispute the legal validity of their dispositions of property which was their own.—p. 611.

ALDERSON, B. (for the JUDGES).—It is, indeed, said that the entry of one coparcener is an entry of both, and that so the entry of William Woodroffe, by which he was remitted, was an entry also by Mrs. Walker, and, therefore, that she also was remitted as to her moiety, and the whole base fee defeated; and for this Smales v. Dale was cited. It may be well doubted whether the third manner of entry by a coparcener, mentioned by the Court there, viz., an entry where one copar-cener claimeth the whole expressly (which is the present case, for W. Woodroffe here clearly entered under the then supposed good title created under Hester and George Woodroffe's deed and recovery), could be an entry by the other coparcener at all. For Coke Littleton, 373, seems quite contrary to this extrajudicial opinion of the judges in Smales v. Dale. But we agree with the Court of Ex. Ch. in thinking, that after the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 12, this cannot be so. There seems no doubt this statute has a relation back, and makes the possession of one coparcener no longer the possession of the other.—p. 832.

LORD HALSBURY.—In Leigh v. Jack . . . the person who established a possession inconsistent with the rights of the person to whom the property had originally belonged, had a strip of land on each side of an intended road, and he had obstructed that intended road by various articles of his trade, but in no sense was there any exclusive possession calculated to make the legal possession change so as to put it in him and to dispossess the real owner of the land. . . . The very nature of this particular piece of land is that it is enclosed.—p. 513.

 very apposite. In that case the land at one time had been the land of the railway company, still by non-user they had lost their right to it. The only possession they had kept was by their workmen going over it to trim a hedge, and that, it was held, was not an act of possession, but was to be attributed simply to an easement.—p. 319.

LINDLEY, M.R.—When possession or dispossession has to be inferred from equivocal acts, the intention with which they are done is all important—see Leigh v. Jack. . . I have looked at all the decisions I can find which throw any light on this subject. Leigh v. Jack is the nearest and most instructive. Rains v. Burton (the underground cellar case) presented no difficulty except on the point of concealed fraud. The owner of the cellar was there plainly dispossessed by the plaintiff, who took and kept possession of the cellar, intending to acquire it for himself. In Seddon v. Smith and Norton v. L. & N. W. Ry. [supra, col. 1599] the acts of ownership were unequivocal—there was ploughing up and cultivation of a slip of land.—p. 89.

R. 413.—MALINS, V.-C. JESSER, M.R.—As I said in Alison. In re [(1879) 11 Ch. D. 284. See "MORTGAGE"], when a title has been extinguished by the statute, no mere acknowledgment by the person who has acquired, under the statute, as good a title as if a conveyance had been made to him, can restore the old title. The contrary was, indeed, decided in Stansfield v. Hobson, but when we look at that case we find that the point is not noticed in the judgment of either of the L.J.J., though it appears to have been taken in argument. Considering the importance of the point, I cannot think that either of those learned judges would have decided it without making any remark on the subject, and I think it must have been overlooked by them. I think, therefore, that Stansfield v. Hobson is no authority in support of the proposition that an acknowledgment after the statute has run can take the case out of the statute; and Alison, In re, which is a decision by the C.A., shows that it cannot. CHELMSFORD, L.C.—After a careful examination of Roddam v. Morley, upon which the V.-C. founded his judgment upon the defence of the Statute of Limitations, I am unable to concur with the reasoning which led to the ultimate decision in that case. It is unnecessary for me to consider whether the parties, tenant for life and remainderman, were to be united in interest, that payment by one might be regarded as an acknowledgment of the debt of the other. This, I think, would undoubtedly be the case if the bond debt had been a charge upon the land; but whether they were so or not, the relation between the parties in Roddam v. Morley renders that case inapplicable to the present. This was the opinion of Westbury, L.C., in Dickenson v. Teasdale, where a similar question arose as to the effect of an acknowledgment by a devisee upon the defence of the Statute of Limitations by a co-devisee. In that case his lordship shortly expressed the same view as I have taken upon this question, and I have, therefore, his authority in support of the view at which I have arrived.—p. 120.

BACON, V.-C.—The case of Roddam v. Morley, which, notwithstanding all that has been said of it in Coope v. Cresswell, or elsewhere, I conceive to be of unquestionable authority, has decided that payment of interest by the tenant for life of a devised estate keeps a specialty alive against the persons entitled in remainder. But the case is also of great value, by reason of the close and careful examination into the Statutes of Limitation, as well by the common law judges, whose assistance was procured by the L.C., as by the L.C. himself. The judges pointed out that the action to be brought could only be one and the same action on the specialty, and not on any new promise, express or implied, from the terms of the acknowledgment, whatever it might have been. They held that a devisee who might plead the bar, if it existed, could only plead it on such single action, and observing that he was capable of making the acknowledgment, and the Statute of Fraudulent Devises having declared that the devisee should be liable and chargeable in the same manner as the heir, they concluded, without hesitation, that the devisee might as properly be said to be "liable by virtue of the indenture," as either the real or personal representative, and, therefore, that by the acknowledgment the action, the only action that could be brought, was set free generally, the statutes having nowhere said that it could be brought only against the party making the acknowledgment.—p. 229.

LORD HOBHOUSE (for the Court).—It is . . . necessary to see how far the authorities have determined the meaning of the word "payment" in sect. 30 [Consolidated Statutes of New Brunswick, c. 84]. • Sect. 29 deals with actions to recover money secured on land and legacies, and provides a limit of twenty years after the right accrued, "unless, in the meantime, some part of the principal money or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable or his agent;" a fresh term of twenty years being given after any such occurrence. It has been disputed whether the words which require that acknowledgment shall be given by the person by whom the money shall be payable or his agent, apply also to payment. It is argued that Chinnery v. Evans and Harlock v. Ashberry have decided that they do so apply. But that was not the ratio decidendi in either case. In both cases the question arose under the English Act of 1837, which corresponds with sect. 30 of the New Brunswick Statute, and not under sect. 40 of the English Act of 1833, which corresponds with sect. 29. . . . In Harlock v. Ashberry the judges considered that the principle which underlies the statutes is that payment must be an admission of right, but they do not discuss the question how far a payment by A. may be admission of right against B. Their conclusion is that statutory payment must be by a person bound, or at least entitled, to pay; and that was quite sufficient for their decision. In Chinnery v. Evans a more direct and simple criticism is applied both by Lord Westbury and Lord Cranworth to the word "payment." They consider that money brought in by a stranger to the mortgage contract would not have the characteristics or legal quality of payment; it would be a gift from a person not entitled to tender it to a person not entitled to demand it. Both learned lords treat the supposed case as almost beyond the bounds of practical matters. . . . The judgment of the three other judges [in the Supreme Court of Canada] who constituted the majority, was delivered by Gwynne, J. . . . He relies on the decision in Bolding v. Lane, where the question related to acknowledgment under the English Act of 1833, corresponding with sect. 29, and on the dictum in Toft v. Stephenson (supra, col. 1604), which Lord Cranworth carefully confines to a case falling under the same enactment. The principle he finds to be established by authority is, that the only person by whom a payment can be made to stay the currency of the statute, is the mortgagor, or some person in privity of estate with him, or the agent of one of them. It will have been seen that their lordships think it necessary to qualify that doctrine.—pp. 643—647.

NORTH, J.—Now the right of John Wilkinson against Joseph Wilkinson and the persons claiming under him, is a right to enforce a charge. That charge may be enforced by way of foreclosure. An action for foreclosure, or the right to bring an action for foreclosure, seems to me to be the same thing, for this purpose. It is clearly within Harlock v. Ashberry an action or right to bring an action for the recovery of land, and it is expressly held to be within sect. 2 of the Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4, and it follows it is equally within sect. 1 of the Act of 1874.—p. 483.

STIRLING, J.—The only decision to which I have been referred on this particular clause [Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, sect. 42] is Bolding v. Lane (col. 1604), where it was decided that an acknowledgment by a mortgagor of more than six years' arrears of interest being due upon a first mortgage does not preclude a personal mortgagee from relying upon the Statute of Limitations. [His lordship read passages from the judgment of Westbury, L.C., and continued:] "If that be taken literally as an interpretation of the statute, then an acknowledgment by an executor does not fall within it. But it may be, having regard to some decisions which I am about to mention, the words of the L.C. are to be taken with some qualification. However that may be, the decision—which is binding on me—appears to be in favour of the view that an acknowledgment made by one executor is not effectual to keep alive the debt against the devisee of the real estate, supposing him to be a different person. If the acknowledgment of the mortgagor, who has an interest in the land, does not prevent a mortgagee from claiming the benefit of the statute, why should the acknowledgment of the executor (who as such has no interest in the land) be more effectual? This seems to be in accordance with decisions on other statutes. It was held in Chinnery v. Evans that payment of interest on a mortgage comprising several estates by a receiver appointed in a mortgagee's action, the rents of one of them operated (under sect. 40 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833) to keep alive the mortgage debt against the others. It was also held in Roddam v. Morley (supra, col. 1602) that payment by a tenant for life of devised real estate of interest on a specialty debt, in which the heirs were bound, was sufficient (under sect. 9 of the Act) to keep the debt alive against the remainderman, and a similar decision was given in Hollingshead, In re, Hollingshead v. Webster (supra, col. 1603), with respect to payment of interest on a simple contract debt, the relevant statute being the Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. 1, c. 16). In all these cases the position or interest of the person making the payment was such that he might fairly be held to represent other persons interested in the land. On the other hand, it was held by Turner, V.-C., in Fordham v. Wallis (supra, col. 1603), following Putnam v. Bates (supra, col. 1582), that the payment of interest on a debt of a testator by the executors, who were also devisees in trust of his real estate, although it kept the debt alive against the personal estate, did not have the same effect against the real estate, the relevant statute being again the Limitation Act, 1623. The V.-C. says: "The case rests upon the decisions in Atkins v. Tredgold (supra, col. 1581) and Slater v. Lawson (supra, col. 1582), and the principle of those cases was this—that one party was not to be bound by the admissions of another, except in cases of continuing joint contract. This principle is surely founded in justice. Apart from purely legal considerations, it cannot,

I think, be doubted that it ought not to be in the power of any person by his admission to revive a right against another, which, but for that admission, would have been wholly extinguished, as was the case in Channell v. Ditchburn" (supra, col. 1582). . . . It was also held by Chelmsford, L.C., in Coope v. Cresswell (supra, col. 1602) . . . that payment of interest on a specialty debt by the executors of the debtor was not sufficient under the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, sect. 5, to keep the debt alive against the devisees of the real estate.—p. 473.

SIR F. JEUNE.—In the case of a receiver, Chinnery v. Evans does appear to me to go so far as to show that a receiver acting within the scope of his authority and dealing with a matter within the mortgage can bar the operation of the statute by part payment of interest on the mortgage debt. The reason is that he is acting within the scope of his authority.—p. 520.

BYRNE, J.—It is argued that the receipt of the policy-moneys operates as a payment within the meaning of sect. 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. With reference to the phrase "unless in the meantime some part of the principal money shall have been paid," I think that the words "in the meantime" must be taken to refer to the period between the time when the action or suit is brought and the time after which the remedy for the debt will otherwise have been barred. The words were so interpreted in . . . Harty v. Davis, with which I must express my agreement. . . . These cases [Chinnery v. Evans, Harlock v. Ashberry, and Lewin v. Wilson] establish that payments by persons standing in certain relations are to be treated as payments giving a new starting point, from which lapse of time is to be calculated. There is but one other authority in which the question has been discussed, and that is Conlan's Estate, In re (col. 1596). . . . I am unable myself to reconcile that decision, so far as the point now under discussion is concerned, with the decision of the C. A. in Harlock v. Ashberry. It appears to me that where the statutory period has run by reason of the twelve years having elapsed, the realisation of the security by the mortgagee after that date does not amount to and cannot be construed as a payment by the mortgagor or his agent, or by some person entitled by virtue of the contract to make a tender of the money, and to enforce payment of it.—p. 480.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The meaning of sect. 26 [Statute of Limitations, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27] has been very much discussed in various cases, such as Petre v. Petre (supra, col. 1568), Rains v. Buxton (supra, col. 1600), Lawrance v. Norreys, and Vane v. Vane. These cases show that, in order to obtain the benefit of sect. 26, the plaintiff in such an action [i.e., of ejectment] must make out three things: (1) that there has been a concealed fraud; (2) that he or his predecessor in title had been deprived of the estate by that fraud; (3) that the fraud had not and could not with reasonable diligence have been known or discovered but within the statutory period (now twelve years) before the action was brought. . . . The case is not like Trustees, Executors and Agency Co. v. Short (supra, col. 1596), where the lands had been left vacant.—pp. 430, 431.

ALVERSTONE, C.J.—As I understand, the old jurisdiction exercised by the Court of equity rested upon the fact that the conscience of the party who was setting up possession as against the title of true owner was affected so that he ought not to be allowed to avail himself of the lapse of time. This is the reason given by the L.C. of Ireland in Morenden v. Annesley (Lord) (supra, col. 1563), and when Kindersley, V.-C., in Petre v. Petre (supra, col. 1568) was considering the meaning of the same sect. 26 [Real Property Limitation Act, 1833], he uses these words: "It does not mean the case of a party entering wrongfully into possession: it means a case of designed fraud, by which a party, knowing to whom the right belongs, conceals the circumstances giving that right, and by means of such concealment enables himself to enter and hold." This passage was quoted verbatim in Lord St. Leonards' Real Property Statutes (2nd ed.), p. 98. It may be said, of course, that these statements of the law are not exhaustive; but I cannot think that such judges would have used the words they did—namely, "by means of such concealment enables him to enter and hold"—if they had contemplated that this section of the statute was dealing with cases of the fraud of third persons (through whom the person in possession does not claim), of which fraud the persons claiming under the statute were wholly innocent. Similarly, in Willis v. Howe (Earl) (supra), Kay, L.J., approves of the passage already cited from Petre v. Petre, and adds these words: "But the word 'concealed' seems to indicate that there were facts known to the person who enters, and designedly concealed by him from the real owner, which facts, if known, would enable the real owner to recover. The deprivation of which the section speaks in such a case is by the fraudulent entry. But that which makes a wrongful entry fraudulent is not only the knowledge, but the concealment of those facts." And, lastly, in Thorne v. Heard, Lord Lindley in the C. A. states the principle of the law in the way I have indicated, and refers to the authorities above mentioned; and Lord Davey, in the H. L., uses language which, though it was uttered with reference to another statute, in my opinion lays down the principle of construction that we ought to apply to this Act, an Act, be it remembered, which only laid down a uniform rule as to the length of time which must have elapsed since possession taken in order to oust the true owner.—p. 210.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J., discussed Petre v. Petre, Willis v. Howe (Earl), and Thorne v. Heard, and continued: I wish to add that the view of Kay, L.J., that the fraud must have deprived the claimant or his predecessors in title of the estate has already been fully established by the judgment of Herschell, L.C., in Lawrance v. Norreys (Lord) (supra); and I wish here to point out two reasons why Scholefield v. Templer ((1859) 28 L. J. Ch. 452; 4 De G. & J. 429; Johns. 155; 5 Jur. (N.S.) 619; 7 W. R. 633.—WOOD, V.-C.) has no application in the present case—first, because in that case the defendant sought to take a benefit from the very fraud which he said deprived the plaintiff of his right of action against him the surety, whereas in the present case neither the defendant nor the general in any sense adopt or seek to take a benefit from the fraud of the plaintiff's mother; secondly, because the fraud of the plaintiff's mother had nothing to do with the possession of General McCallum or the depriving the plaintiff of her land: she was deprived of her land by the possession of her father, she was not deprived of the land by the fraud of her mother.—pp. 215, 216.

But the V.-C. in Watson v. Birch determined that upon the true construction of these two statutes, the statute which related to judgments was 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27. Taking that view, he held that a judgment debt twenty years old could not be enforced even as against the personal estate of the judgment debtor. That decision has been accepted and acted upon by everybody without question ever since; and the law as settled by that decision, and by other decisions which have followed it, is to the short effect that, under that Act, a judgment is barred after twenty years.—p. 132. HALL, V.-C.—The question which has been argued as to the application of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, to this case, the property mortgaged being a reversionary interest, is not upon the authorities in a satisfactory state. I find that the point was considered by Lord St. Leonards in Vincent v. Going. [The V.-C., after stating the facts of the case, continued:] It seems, therefore, to me that that is a direct decision by Lord St. Leonards on the point, and in the year 1844. That case is not, I think, referred to in any of the subsequent cases, and that is rather remarkable. The next case, Sinclair v. Jackson, was decided in 1853, and it is a direct authority upon the point to the same effect. . . . I consider that the judgment of the V.-C. in Wheeler v. Howell is a decision the other way upon the point. It is very shortly put, as it merely shows that the statute does not apply to arrears of an annuity charged upon a reversionary interest on land, so long as the interest continues to be reversionary. I think the case was decided upon sect. 42. . . . In regard to the other case of Bowyer v. Woodman, which was a decision of Wood, V.-C., the other way, I do not think I can put it in competition with his previous judgment, as I do not think the point there was really very much before the Court. . . . In this state of the authorities on that part of the case, I should consider myself . . . bound to hold that the arrears would not be recoverable while this property was reversionary.—p. 147.

KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—In *Mason v. KAY, J.—My conclusion from these authorities is that where debts are charged upon a testator's real estate by his will, or as judgment debts under the old law, a suit by such creditors to administer real and personal estate is a lis pendens, which, when registered, gives the plaintiffs priority over a purchaser or mortgagee from any defendant entitled to real estate under the will. But there is an exception where the defendant is in such a position that the purchaser has a right to suppose he is selling or mortgaging for the purpose of paying the testator's debts. This was the case, as Lord St. Leonards points out [in *Drew v.
Norbury (Earl)*], in Walker v. Flamstead.—

WILLS, J.

SMITH, L.J.—With all submission to the late
Mr. Justice Stephen and to my brother Vaughan Williams, who, in Dover Borough Council and

Kent County Council, In re, and Kent County Council and Sandwich Borough Council, In re, held that sub-sect. 5 of sect. 35 [of the Local Government Act, 1888] was to be read as a general provision applicable to both the larger and smaller class of boroughs, I cannot agree. To hold so would, in my opinion, be doing such violence to the provisions and framework of the Act as no Court would be justified in doing, even if the suggested imputations upon the legislation be well founded, which I am by no means convinced of. The special provisions of sub-sect. 5 of sect. 35 applicable to the larger boroughs are, in my judgment, purposely omitted from sect. 38, which is applicable to the smaller boroughs. The special provisions of sub-sect. 5 of sect. 38 are, as was pointed out by counsel for the defendants, such as to tax the borough for the expenses of the county, and not the county for the expenses of the borough; and yet it is now said by the borough that the true reading of the Act is that the county should pay these expenses (salaries of recorder and clerk of the peace) of the borough. . . . My brother Wills has followed and agreed with Herefordshire County Council, In re, wherein a Divisional Court held, following Cornwall County Council v. Truro Town Council, a case of a borough with a population of over 10,000, that the salary of the clerk to borough petty sessions had since the Act of 1888 to be paid by the county council and not by the borough. The correctness of this decision is now challenged in this Court, and we have to say if it be rightly decided. . . . It is not suggested that any Act prior to the Petty Sessions Act, 1849, placed the appointment and payment of a salaried clerk to a borough petty sessions in the county council, and it is not denied that prior to the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, the borough appointed and paid the salaried clerk to its own petty sessions. It is, however, said that the Local Government Act, 1888, changes all this, and that sect. 84 is the section which affects this. . . . Section 84, which follows sect. 83, deals, in my judgment, with exactly the same class of salaried clerks as sect. 83—that is, salaried clerks of county petty sessional divisions, and not with salaried clerks of borough petty sessional divisions. The words “every petty sessional division” in sect. 84, according to the context and whole scope of the Act, mean, in my opinion, a county and not a borough petty sessional division. It will be seen that by sect. 84, sub-sect. 1, the appointment as well as the removal of the salaried clerk mentioned in the section is expressly left where this had been prior to the passing of the Act—that is, the appointment and removal of a county petty sessional salaried clerk is left with the county authority. If this sub-section applied to a borough petty sessions salaried clerk, which, I think, it does not, then the appointment and removal of a borough petty sessional salaried clerk is left with the borough authority. Sub-section 2 of sect. 84 also appears to throw light upon this, for by it the joint committee, composed as above-mentioned of county men, is introduced to deal with the “officers” mentioned in sects. 83 and 84. What has such a committee to do with a borough officer, to whose selection, appointment, and approval they are strangers, and advisedly kept strangers by the Act, though it is now said they are by reason of the Act to pay his salary? I do not see the object or sense of this, and, in my opinion, it is not the true construction of the Act. In my judgment, sect. 84 of the Act of 1888 does not apply to borough petty sessions salaried clerks at all, and therefore does not shift the payment of such salaried clerks on to the county council. In my judgment, the corporation of Thetford is liable to pay the salary of its own clerk to its own borough petty sessions, as it was before the passing of the Act of 1888, and this obligation is not by the Act cast upon the county of Norfolk; and Herefordshire County Council, In re, was not rightly decided.—pp. 909, 910, 911.

STIRLING, J.—The plaintiffs do allege that Mr. L. has influence with the board, that he has used it with a view to his own private interest and advantage, and not with a view to the proper discharge by the board of their public duties, and that consequently the plaintiffs have not succeeded in inducing the board to take steps for the protection of the footway. It is not alleged that the members of the board other than Mr. L. have been guilty of any malpractice, or that the influence he is alleged to have over them has been acquired by any illegitimate means, or even that they have surrendered their judgment to him, or acted as his tools. It is consistent with the plaintiffs' allegations that all the members of the board (other than Mr. L.) do in good faith believe that their acts are entirely in accordance with the due discharge by them of their public duties; but it is contended that the acts of the board are vitiated by reason of Mr. L. having been present at the meetings when the plaintiffs' applications were discussed, being allowed to speak and use his influence with the board, and ultimately succeeding in inducing the board to take his views. . . . In support of this argument Aberdeen Railway v. Blakie was cited. It was there held that a contract entered into between the company and a firm of which one of the directors was a partner could not be enforced against the company, and was voidable at the option of the company. If, however, the company or the directors, after a full disclosure of the interest of the contracting director, chose to affirm the contract, I apprehend that it would be binding on the company. At all events the case is not an authority for the proposition that the existence of such an interest, disclosed or undisclosed, as is attributed to Mr. L., vitiates the resolution of the board.—p. 109.

Melliss v. Shirley Local Board (1885) 54 L. J. Q. B. 408; 14 Q. B. D. 911; 52 L. T. 544.—CAVE, J.

CAVE, J.—It was contended by Mr. Mackenzie that although the sum did amount ultimately to 62l. 8s., yet at the time when the order was given for the special report to be made, it did not necessarily follow that the amount would be over 50l., and consequently that no contract under seal was necessary; and he referred me on that point to the case of Eaton v. Basker, which was an action brought by a medical man against a local board, where he had verbally agreed with the committee to attend patients at the rate of 5s. 3d. per tent per day. Now it is obvious that according to the terms of that agreement, at the end of each day he was entitled to his 5s. 3d. per tent, and that if he were discharged, for instance, at the end of the day, or if the fever proved to be more tractable than it turned out to be, the sum to which he would be entitled would be considerably less than 50l., and that in any event he would be entitled to recover a series of sums none of them coming up to the sum of 50l. In this case, on the contrary, there is no evidence to satisfy me that it was ever contemplated that a special report would come to a less sum than 50l., and there never was a period when the plaintiffs were entitled to sue for a less sum than 50l.—p. 413.

BRETT, M.R.—We have been referred to Maude v. Baildon Local Board. That case was determined by Pollock and Huddleston, BB., and North, J., who appear to have considered that Reg. v. Dryman (7 E. & B. 672; 26 L. J. M. C. 128), was an authority binding upon them in that case. I respectfully differ from the judgment in Maude v. Baildon Local Board: I think that the learned judges in that case mistook the point actually decided in Reg. v. Dayman.—p. 195. BOWEN, L.J. agreed.

FRY, J.—But then, it is said that I am precluded from coming to that conclusion by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Nutter v. Accrington Local Board of Health. That case has decided clearly that a street is not the less a street because it is a turnpike road; but I find in it no decision upon the effect of the section of the Act of 15 & 16 Vict. to which I have been referred. It is true that the section seems to have been stated to the Court; but for some reason or other, I know not what, it did not attract their attention sufficiently to receive from them any judicial decision. That case, therefore, not determining it, I should feel myself bound to give effect to what appears to me to be a very clear cause in an Act of Parliament. But further than that, the conclusion I have arrived at is in perfect harmony with the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case. . . . The

JAMES, L.J.—It is impossible to read any of the three judgments delivered on that occasion without seeing that in the view of the learned judges the soil and freehold, in the ordinary sense of the words "soil and freehold," that is to say, the soil from the centre of the earth up to an unlimited extent into space, did not pass, and that no stratum or portion of the soil, defined or ascertainable like a vein of coal, or stratum of ironstone, or anything of that kind, passed, but that the board had only the surface, and with the surface such right below the surface as was essential to the maintenance and occupation and exclusive possession of the street, and the making and maintaining of the street for the use of the public.—p. 795.

LORD HERSHELL.—But no doubt the opinion was expressed there that the vesting of the street would carry something more than the mere surface, and that in addition to what was necessary for its maintenance as a highway there would be transferred to the urban authority soil below that sufficient for all the ordinary uses of land below a highway. I confess I see considerable difficulty in accepting any such view. In the first place, the language of the enactment [the Public Health Act, 1875] seems to me to point in the contrary direction. The vesting words are "such street" (the street a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) "and the pavement stones and other materials thereof." All that seems to point to the surface use of the street as a highway and nothing more, and I am unable to see why it should be supposed to transfer to and vest in the urban authority the subsoil below for sewerage purposes, because that is provided for, and amply provided for, by other provisions in the same statute.—p. 456.

MELLOR, J.—I confess myself quite unable to see the exact reasons on which the cases cited to us proceeded. The first case, that of *Young v. Those being cases which could not be carried to error, and which are not, therefore, binding decisions on us, we must form the best opinion we can on the case before us, if we do not see in the cases cited reasons satisfactory to our minds.—p. 55.

WILLS, J.—It is to be regretted that the parties appear to have been misled by the report of Travis v. Uttley in the Law Reports having alluded to the Act of 1890 as if it had been really cited by way of argument, whereas in fact that Act, not having been adopted by the local authority in that case, as it has been by the defendants here, did not apply. It is fortunate that both the counsel in that case have been present in Court to-day to confirm our mutual impression that Travis v. Uttley did not have any reference to the interpretation of the Public Health Act, 1890.—p. 220.

WRIGHT, J.—If Travis v. Uttley could have been carried to the Appeal Court, I should have been glad, though I am perfectly satisfied with the decision so far as it goes.—p. 220.

[NOTE.—It has since been ascertained that the Halifax Corporation, the appellants in Travis v. Uttley, had adopted the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, but that sect. 19 of that Act did not apply owing to the drain, there held to be a sewer, being connected with houses belonging to one owner, whereas the section only applies to a drain "of two or more houses belonging to different owners."]

Hill v. Hair (1895) 64 L. J. M. C. 164; [1895] 1 Q. B. 906; 15 K. 424; 72 L. T. 629; 43 W. R. 651; 59 J. P. 374.—CAVE and LAWRENCE, JJ.

CAVE, J.—Travis v. Uttley lays down no new doctrine, but one already very well understood. . . . The only case which caused me any difficulty was that of Self v. Hove Commissioners, and I was for a time pressed by the observations of Wills, J. in that case; but I observe that, as is often the case, the observations of a judge must be read closely in connection with the subject-matter under observation, and I find in that case both houses were stated to be semi-detached and enclosed by one outer wall, and apparently within one curtilage, and that certainly seems to me to afford a ground for an explanation of Wills, J.'s observations in that place. . . . Whether that may have been the fact or not, it was immaterial to the main point decided in that case. The subject-matter here is found not to be a private drain, nor is it a sewer for private profit within the exception of sect. 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875. I think that the provision of the local Act may be found applicable to private drains of more than one house without making it repeal the clause of the General Act, and thereby turning that which, under the General Act, is within the meaning of a "sewer," into a private drain.

Beckenham Urban District Council v. Wood (1896) 60 J. P. 490.—CAVE and WILLS, JJ.

WILLS, J.—I must say, and I speak for myself only, because I do not presume to criticise my brother Wright's view, that if the expression attributed to me is understood to mean that a part of the system which ends in an undoubted sewer must necessarily be a sewer above the point where it becomes a sewer, I think that is erroneous, and I have no hesitation in saying so, because it is my own expression, which I am free to criticise as I like. I am certainly not prepared to abide by any such general statement as that.—p. 491.

Bradford v. Eastbourne Corporation (1896) 65 L. J. Q. B. 571; [1896] 2 Q. B. 205; 74 L. T. 762; 45 W. R. 31; 60 J. P. 401.—RUSSELL, C.J. and WILLS, J.

RUSSELL, C.J.—There is no substantial difference between the drain in the case before us and that in Self v. Hove Commissioners and that in Hill v. Hair. In the present case it drains houses belonging to different owners, and enters the public sewer, and the local authority have adopted the Act of 1890. In consequence of the impossibility of reconciling the decisions in Self v. Hove Commissioners and Hill v. Hair, I have reconsidered the whole question independently of those cases.

The real question is, what is the proper application of sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890? The section says that where two or more houses belonging to different owners are connected with the public sewer by a single private drain, the local authority may deal with that drain in the same way, both as to the execution of works and recovery of expenses, as it may deal with drains, ashpits, and cesspools under sect. 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The first point of difficulty is, what is a single private drain? Sub-sect. 3 says that a drain includes a drain used for the drainage of more than one building. This very much widens the definition of drain given in sect. 4 of the principal Act of 1875. In that section a drain means any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or of premises within the same curtilage. What, then, is the meaning in sect. 19 of the words "single private drain"? What is a private drain, and can there be a private drain connecting two or more houses (belonging to different owners) with a public sewer? Prior to the passing of the Act of 1890, by the operation of the Act of 1875 (and, indeed, by the operation of the prior Act of 1848), there could not be a private drain which connected two or more houses (belonging to different owners) with a public sewer, because any such drain was a sewer, and was a sewer vested in the local authority. Therefore it might be said that the drain in this case is not a private drain, because it was vested in the local authority, if the word "private" is to be taken and used in the sense of belonging to an individual; and it was not a drain at all, because it came under the definition of "sewer" in sect. 4 of the Act of 1875, and in sect. 2 of the Act of 1848. But the Act of 1890, for the purposes of sect. 19, and for those purposes only, widens the definition of "drain" contained in sect. 4 of the Act of 1875; and therefore there seems to be no difficulty in interpreting sect. 19 with regard to the word "drain." In the case before us it seems to me to be clear that the drain was a drain within the meaning of the definition given in sub-sect. 3 of sect. 19.

The next question is, what is the meaning of the word "private" in "single private drain," and what meaning can be given to it which shall harmonise with the application of sect. 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875? It has been suggested that the expression "private drain" might be said to apply only to drains of the character set out in sect. 19 of the Act of 1890, which were constructed after the passing of the Act of 1890; in other words, that the Act had no retrospective force. That would be a very simple way of getting out of the difficulties of the section. But the words of the section are not "shall be," but "are"; and therefore when it says that where two or more houses belonging to different owners "are" connected with the public sewer, it points, I think, to a state of things in existence at the time of the passing of the Act, which is to be altered. If, then, the provision is retrospective, what effect is to be given to sect. 13 of the Act of 1875 in this connection? Now that section says that all existing and future sewers shall vest in and be under the control of the local authority. The word "sewer" here will no longer include the drain in question in this case, which is a drain under and for the purposes only of sect. 19 of the Act of 1890. But inasmuch, as prior to the passing of the Act of 1890 that drain was a sewer vesting in the local authority, does the vesting control the natural application of the new definition? If, indeed, the absolute property in the sewer were given by sect. 13 of the Act of 1875 to the local authority, one might feel some difficulty in making this section applicable to drains constituted prior to 1890, notwithstanding the use of the word "are." But what is the meaning of the word "vest" in sect. 13 of the Act of 1875? It has been clearly held that the vesting is not a giving of the property in the sewer and in the soil surrounding it to the local authority, but giving such ownership and such rights only as are necessary for the purpose of carrying out the duties of a local authority with regard to the subject-matter—Coverdale v. Charlton (48 L. J. Q. B. 128; 4 Q. B. D. 104), Rolls v. St. George the Martyr, Southwark (49 L. J. Ch. 691; 14 Ch. D. 785), A. G. v. Dorking (51 L. J. Ch. 585; 20 Ch. D. 595) and Birkenhead Corporation v. L. & N. W. Ry. (55 L. J. Q. B. 48; 15 Q. B. D. 572). But if the duty is partly or entirely shifted from the local authority to individuals, that right which the word "vest" gives to the local authority disappears to the same extent. Therefore it does not appear that there is any difficulty arising from the word "vest" in sect. 13 of the Act of 1875.

I am unable to see any special use in the word "private" in this section, but it is intelligible, and, I think, means a drain originally constructed for the drainage of one or more houses, as distinguished from a drain or sewer which any member of the public may have a right to use by connecting to it the drain from his own house. We must put some reasonable interpretation on the section, and in this construction of it there is no difficulty in applying it to the present case. If it does not govern the class of drain in this case, which is for all purposes identical with that in Self v. Hove Commissioners and in Hill v. Hair, what application can the section have? A drain now, by the combined operation of sect. 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and sect. 19 of the Act of 1890, for the purposes of this latter section and for these purposes only, includes—first, a drain used for the drainage of one building only; secondly, a drain used for the drainage of premises within the same curtilage; and, thirdly, a drain used for the drainage of more than one building. The section therefore applies to two or more houses belonging to different owners connected with a public sewer by a single private drain, whether within the same curtilage or not. If it were only intended to apply to drains which did not vest in the local authority prior to 1890, it is difficult to understand the object of making a new definition of the word "drain" for the purpose of applying sect. 41 of the Act of 1875. The local authorities could already deal with drains draining one building, and drains draining premises within the same curtilage—see sect. 4 of the Act of 1875, and sect. 41 of the same Act. Moreover, the object of sect. 19 of the Act of 1890 is to give increased power to the local authorities enumerated in the Act, and therefore the second exception under the definition "sewer" in sect. 4 of the Act of 1875 does not help us, especially as the class of drains there mentioned are not sewers.

Further, since it is intended to throw upon owners of houses certain expenses, it is difficult to suppose that the section can have been intended to operate on the first exception to sect. 13 of the Act of 1875—namely, sewers made for profit. It is difficult to suppose that the legislature intended that the owners of houses are to be called upon to pay the cost of repairing a sewage system such as that in Minehead Local Board v. Luttrell. The second exception to sect. 13 of the Act of 1875 affords no assistance, as it deals with land drainage; neither does the third exception, because the local authority can have no power over these sewers except as provided by sect. 327, sub-sect. 1. Nor does the proviso of sect. 13 help us, as it points to public sewers constructed by a public body for public use. It appears to me to follow that the section could practically have no operation at all if it were not intended to apply to such cases as that before us. I am therefore of opinion that in this case the drain was a single private drain connecting two or more houses belonging to different owners, with the public sewer, and that therefore, under sect. 19 of the Act of 1890, the local authority were entitled to proceed under sect. 41 of the Act of 1875. I agree in the decision of Self v. Hove Commissioners, and I think the County Court judge was right in following it. It follows that I do not agree with the judgment of Hill v. Hair.—pp. 573, 574 and 575.

WILKS, J.—There is an expression in my judgment [in Travis v. Uttley] which my brother Cave and myself have very recently decided to be erroneous. I have said that "it is impossible to say that the part which is used for the drainage of one building is a drain, and the rest a sewer. The drain is a sewer from end to end." In Kershaw v. Taylor, however, the C. A. decided that under such circumstances the same conduit was a drain so long as it received the drainage of one house only, but a sewer from the point where the drainage of the second house came into the conduit. The passage, therefore, that I have cited from my judgment in Travis v. Uttley must be considered as erroneous. It was not necessary for the judgment, and the correction does not affect the decision. The error, however, in the obiter dictum and the decision itself are alike foreign to the present inquiry. Travis v. Uttley had nothing to do with sect. 19 of the Act of 1890, and it has no bearing at all upon the present case. Self v. Hove Commissioners, unless it is to be discarded, is a decision precisely in point with respect to the present case,—p. 578.

CAVE, J.—That section [19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890] applies to a drain constructed upon private ground to which the public have not access, and means that the public are to be relieved from repairing that which they are not free to use. Therefore, a "private drain" must be a drain not only within sub-sect. 3, but also one which is private and not open to public user. Where a drain runs through private land it is private. Although entry may be made upon the land for the purpose of making the drain effectual, there is no power to carry the drainage of other houses through the private land into that drain. That appears to be the most reasonable meaning to place upon the words "private drain." It may be said that although that construction is in harmony with the decisions in some of the former cases, it is not in accordance with Hill v. Hair, to which I was a party. I think that the law was wrongly applied in Hill v. Hair if the drain was a private drain within the meaning I have attributed to those words. It has been said that the inference ought to be drawn that the drain was a private drain from the fact that it was made through private ground. It may have been a drain into which the owner thereof would be entitled to allow other people to drain on payment of money, or to refuse such permission. If so, it undoubtedly would be a private drain, and in that sense would come within the suggestion which I threw out in that case—namely, that a private drain means a drain which a person makes for his own profit. It is not one into which the public can drain. That is, I think, the substantial distinction between the private drain mentioned in sect. 19, and other sewers which are vested, although they may drain only a few houses, in the local authority.—pp. 39, 40.

CHANNELL, J.—We think that the decision of Romer, J., in Handsworth Local Board v. Taylor, which was quoted to us, applies only to a growing street, and that in the present case if there had been new buildings fronting this street, the authority might have said that they had never been satisfied with the sewerage of the street which it had become. They have, however, been satisfied with the sewerage of the street which it in fact is. The necessity for the works now proposed has not arisen from any change of things in the street in question, but from a new general system of sewerage of the district having been recently adopted. The new sewer in this locality is really wanted for the houses in Picasant Street and Hindle Street, and it would be a very remarkable result of the legislation if the fact of there being a private back passage between these two streets enabled the local authority to do at the private expense of the owners, work which, if there were no such passage, would have to be done at the public expense.—p. 392.

ROMER, J.—None of these cases at all touch, as it appears to me, the case before me, or the facts on which I have to decide the case. The case here is not a case where a landowner has merely put in sewers for the purpose of draining his own houses, and merely looks to be compensated for his expenditure in the advantages that accrue to his houses that are drained by having a proper system of drainage. That is not the case here. This is a case where, it appears to me, the defendant has laid out money for the purpose of making sewers, intending to be compensated and paid directly for his expenditure on the sewers, and to be remunerated for his expenditure directly by receiving payments from all persons, whether they are his tenants or not, who avail themselves of the benefit of his sewers; and where he is intending to receive, and did receive payments, direct to himself by the persons using his sewers, for the benefit of his sewers; and where he has, by reason of his expenditure, received direct remuneration for the expenditure in the way I have indicated.

. . . It appears to me that this is undoubtedly a case where the defendant made the sewer for his own profit within the meaning of sect. 13, sub-sect. 1, of the Public Health Act, 1875.—

DARLING, JJ.

RIDLEY, J.—The present case is distinguish-able from Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board.
There is no doubt some resemblance between the material provisions of the [Metropolis Management] Act of 1855, and of the Public Health Act, 1875. Under the Act of 1855 the pavement vested in the respondents, just as under the Act of 1875 the sewer vested in the local board. Section 105 of the former Act, like sect. 150 of the latter Act, empowers the local authority, in case the property vested in them is not to their satisfaction, to put it in proper condition at the expense of the adjoining owners.
The facts of the two cases, however, are by no means identical. In Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board, the owners of the estate had made a sewer which, at the time when it vested in the local board, was sufficient for the purposes for which it was required, and would have remained sufficient if the system of drainage had not been altered. In the present case, however, the adjoining owners have only paved a part of the footway on the east side of the street, and it does not even appear that the paving is of a permanent character. Moreover, the magistrate finds that all the works done by the respondents to the street, with the exception of some paving on the east footway, were temporary repairs done by them as surveyors of highways. The owners have done substantially nothing, and the respondents have done substantially nothing, and have recovered nothing from the owners.
Further, in Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board, at the time when the sewer vested in the local board, it was engaged in the work of discharging, and the local board, having done nothing for some years were taken by the Court to have been satisfied that it was sufficient for that purpose. Here, the traffic in the road was at first very small, and it is only by reason of its subsequent increase that the work of repaving has become necessary. Section 105 of the Act of 1855 empowers the vestry, if they deem it necessary that a street which is not paved to their satisfaction should be paved, to pave it at the expense of the adjoining owners. The idea underlying the section seems to be that where a district is becoming populous and the traffic consequently increasing, the adjoining owners shall bear the expense of paving the streets when it becomes necessary that they should be paved, and shall not be called upon to do so again. In view of these considerations, it seems to me that the case is outside the principle of Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board, and that the respondents have not lost the right to proceed under sect. 105 merely by not having caused the street to be repaved for 16 years after it vested in them.—p. 566.

ROMER, J.—I do not think that the sewers made by the plaintiffs were made "for their own profit," within the meaning of that term as used in the section [sect. 13, sub-sect. 1, of the Public Health Act, 1875]. . . . I cannot myself, on the real facts of the case, distinguish the case before me from the other authorities, of which Ferrand v. Hallas Land and Building Co. is an example. In my opinion, on the facts, I am satisfied that these sewers were laid out merely for the purpose of this particular building scheme, and for no other purpose. . . . No doubt the plaintiffs did expect to be recouped by the purchasers the sum they expended; but what did they do? They apportioned the expenses between the different plots, and when a particular plot was sold they took care to get from each purchaser of the plot, who had to pay a proportionate rent, a payment in respect of his proportion of the sewer. It is only thus that the plaintiffs expected to be recouped their expenses of the sewer—namely, by the increased value of the plots let out. That is exactly, neither more nor less, what is the case in the present instance. . . . I need scarcely say that the case referred to, which was decided by me, of Minehead Local Board v. Luttrell, is clearly distinguishable by reason of the obvious facts which are stated in that case.—p. 415.

STIRLING, J.—It is, however, contended for the plaintiff that they [the pipes] fall within the first exception in sect. 13—viz., "sewers made by any person for his own profit." The meaning of this exception has been considered in several cases. In Minehead Local Board v. Luttrell it was held that sewers constructed by a landowner for the use of persons by whom he was to be remunerated by a direct money payment for the use of them fall within the exception. The word "profit," however, is not, in my opinion, to be restricted to a direct money payment. This was laid down in Ferrand v. Hallas Land and Building Co. . . . When the object of making the sewer is not either for sanitary or mere ordinary drainage purposes, but to enable the land to be occupied more profitably or to avoid an expenditure which would otherwise have to be incurred, in order that the occupation might be equally beneficial, it seems to me that the sewer is made for the "profit" of the occupier.—pp. 588, 589.

STEPHEN, J.—There are two questions reserved by the justices. To the first of them I answer that it was sufficient to prove that the manufacture being one causing effluvia, such effluvia was a nuisance whether causing injury to health or not. The four sections, commencing with the 112th, relate to the subject of offensive trades, some of which are enumerated and the others dealt with by general words. The 114th section speaks of effluvia which are "a nuisance, or injurious to health," and it is said that this must be read as if it ran "a nuisance injurious to health." I do not think that is its meaning, and it obviously is not its literal meaning. The way in which it is sought to show that it is its proper meaning is by reference to 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, and the case of the Great Western Railway Co. v. Bishop decided on the construction of the 8th section of that Act. This decision, regard being had to the subject-matter of it, seems to me to come to this (a principle which is contained in part of the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice), that the word "nuisance" cannot there be taken in its fullest sense, as that would lead to some obvious absurdities. It is said, then, that in the Act in question the word must be restricted to nuisances affecting the public health, because that was the object of the Act, and must not be extended to nuisances with which it was not the intention of the Act to deal. Applying that principle to this enactment it seems to me that in these sections the word nuisance must mean any nuisance connected with the carrying on of any offensive trade specified, and that the diminution of comfort thereby is one of the nuisances included in the Act. I am not convinced by Mr. Cave's argument as to the analogous section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, because the sections under this heading "offensive trades" in the Act we are now considering are complete in themselves.—p. 306.

STEPHEN, J.—Now in the case of Great Western Railway Co. v. Bishop, the particular nuisance complained of was not only not injurious to health, but it was not a nuisance that in any kind of way related to the health, or even to the permanent comfort, of any of the neighbours. It was a mere common law nuisance like the repair of a highway. The appellants allowed ruin-water to drip from one of their bridges on to the highway, and the Court held that that was not the sort of thing the legislature meant by using the words "nuisance or injurious to health" in 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121. I think that that case does not throw any light upon what the decision of the Court would have been if the nuisance, though not absolutely injurious to health, was one which would interfere with the permanent comfort of those in the neighbourhood, and might probably become injurious to health. I see a great distinction between water dripping from a bridge, and a heap of ashes and refuse producing noisome effluvia, as in the present case. The Court, in Great Western Railway Co. v. Bishop, abstained from bringing within the purview of the Nuisance Removal Act, 1855, a nuisance of an entirely different kind from the nuisances the legislature intended to deal with.—p. 140.

MATHEW, J.—It may be that in Whitechurch, Ex parte, the justices went too far in ordering the owner of the premises "to fill up the ashpit, to abandon the privy, and to construct a proper and sufficient pail-closet in lieu thereof." Here, there being an existing privy which was found to be a nuisance and injurious to health, the sanitary authority, in order to abate it, have directed certain works to be done—not the construction of a new privy, but the amendment of the existing one, subject to an appeal to the sessions—and the sessions have adopted the mode suggested by the sanitary authority for the abatement of the nuisance. I cannot doubt that they had jurisdiction to make the order they have made. I adopt the decision in Saunders, Ex parte. If that case differs from Whitechurch, Ex parte, I differ too.—p. 683.

RUSSELL, C.J., after stating the facts, continued: "The Harbour" so described and so conducted in no material particular differs from the house the subject of inquiry in Booth v. Ferrett. We therefore think that the present case is not in principle different from that case. The next inquiry is: Was that case rightly decided? The learned judges in Booth v. Ferrett came to the conclusion (but with hesitation) that a similar house and similarly conducted to the present was not a common lodging-house on two grounds: First, that it was not carried on as a business for the sake of profit, but as a humane or charitable enterprise; and secondly, that it was not open to all comers, as it was stated a common lodging-house was. Before examining these grounds of decision more closely it will be well to examine the scheme of legislation on this subject, and to endeavour to get a clear conception of its object. [His lordship considered the material sections of the Common Lodging-Houses Acts, 1851 and 1853, and continued:] The legislation, therefore, on this subject had for its object, by inspection and control, to secure for the poor in these houses conditions safeguarding health and preventing the spread of disease, which people better off are supposed to be able to secure for themselves. (See per Lindley, J., in Langdon v. Broadbent, 37 L. T. 434.) The statutes in question are therefore to be regarded simply as measures of sanitary protection. Applying these considerations to the first ground on which the decision in Booth v. Ferrett was based, it seems impossible to admit that the fact that the house or building in question was carried on for charitable objects, and not for gain, would take it out of the measure of sanitary protection, if otherwise it would be within it. The question is not with what object or prompted by what motive the house is carried on, but whether the house is such and is so carried on as a lodging-house as to be within the provisions of the Act, as it is clearly within the mischief aimed at by the Act. It is to be observed that the learned judges in Booth v. Ferrett differentiated the house in that case from a common lodging-house only on the two grounds which I have mentioned. If large numbers of the most wretched class are sleeping in common rooms, insanitary conditions are, in the absence of inspection, supervision, and control, not unlikely to arise; and it was the object of the law to secure that inspection, supervision, and control. We fail to see the relevance, in this connection, for the motive actuating the keeper of such a house, whether it be philanthropic or mercenary. But the second ground of the decision is that "The Harbour" is not within the statute, on the ground that a common lodging-house is open to all comers in this sense—that the keeper of such a house cannot refuse admission to any applicant. Is this so? To give to a common lodging-house this character is to attach to its keeper obligations analogous to those of a common carrier or a common innkeeper. We are unaware of any authority for this position. The language of Lindley, J. in Langdon v. Broadbent is referred to, where he speaks of a common lodging-house as one "open to all comers"; that is, as we understand the language, where practically all comers are received without discrimination. But that is a very different thing from saying that the keeper is under an obligation to receive all comers. We see no reason to doubt that the keeper of a common lodging-house might refuse to admit drunk or disorderly, or uncleanly men, or men of known evil reputation, or thieves and the like, or indeed any person whom he chose to exclude. Further, it seems to us, on the facts before us, that "The Harbour" might properly be described in the same sense as open to all comers. . . . The only restrictions on admission which may suggest a difference between "The Harbour" and registered common lodging-houses are the regulations—first, that men who are able to pay for better accommodation are not allowed to make "The Harbour" their permanent home; and secondly, that "The Harbour" is not to be used to assist idle men to lead a lazy life. We cannot assent to the view that this is sufficient to differentiate the two classes of houses. We know of no better description of a common lodging-house than that given by the then law officers, Sir Alexander Cockburn and Sir W. Page Wood, to the effect that a common lodging-house is that class of lodging-house in which persons of the poorer class are received for short periods, and though strangers to one another, are allowed to inhabit one common room (see Lumley, Public Health, 5th ed., p. 99). If this be the proper description of a common lodging-house, as we think it is, we cannot see in what material respect it differs from the respondent's shelter. We arrive, therefore, without hesitation, at the conclusion that such shelter is a common lodging-house within the meaning of the Act of 1853. It follows that we think that Booth v. Ferrett was wrongly decided, and that the magistrate's decision was wrong in point of law. It is to be observed, however, that the magistrate decided in deference to the authority of Booth v. Ferrett, and indeed that the same magistrate had in that very case decided that in his judgment the shelter was a common lodging-house. We desire to point out that in delivering his judgment Lord Coleridge was careful to say that he delivered it without any great degree of confidence. Differing from the decision of the Court in that case, ought we nevertheless to act upon it? We think not. The case being criminal in its nature could not have been brought under review by appeal. It was decided only nine years ago, and there has been no such acceptance of it and no such action upon it as should preclude us from expressing the view of the law which we are convinced is right.—pp. 135 et seq.

Booth v. Ferrett, treated as overruled.

Logsdon v. Trotter (1900) 69 L. J. Q. B. 312; [1900] 1 Q. B. 617; 82 L. T. 151; 48 W. R. 365; 64 J. P. 421.—CHANNELL and BUCKNILL, JJ.

CHANNELL, J.—We have the advantage of a recent authoritative decision upon a point extremely similar, as to whether a Salvation Army shelter was a common lodging-house. In the first instance it struck me that the institutions in that case and in the present were practically identical, but counsel for the respondent pointed out some distinctions between them. He pointed out (and when the facts are looked at there is no doubt about it) that this institution is of a somewhat higher class than the Salvation Army shelter. We must therefore now look at Logsdon v. Booth, and find out where the line was drawn there, and then see whether the present case is only a very small step beyond it, but whether that small step does not carry the present case beyond the line there laid down. We have therefore to see what principle was laid down in Logsdon v. Booth by which a common lodging-house is to be defined. Four different things have been mentioned in various cases upon the subject as either the only tests, or some of the possible tests as to whether an institution was a common lodging-house or not. One of these, applied in Booth v. Ferrett, as to the institution being one not carried on for profit, has been conclusively disposed of by Logsdon v. Booth, and this is the one upon which the case now before us was in fact decided, because at the time the magistrate decided it Booth v. Ferrett was standing as an authority. The other three grounds mentioned as tests are these: First of all, that "common lodging-house" means a low-class lodging-house—one for people of low class—that is to say, a class of society which is dirty, likely to be diseased, and so on. All the earlier cases, I think, agree that that is one element, and that unless the place under consideration is a lodging-house for people of that class it does not come within the description "common lodging-house." I think the element exists in the present case. . . . The second ground suggested and apparently made the principle of the decision in Langdon v. Broadbent, was that "common lodging-house" meant a lodging-house which is open to all comers. . . . The ground that the house must be open to all comers, in the sense that the keeper of such house could not refuse admission to any applicant, has been clearly negatived by the decision of Logsdon v. Booth. . . . If it was meant by what was said by Lindley, J. [in Langdon v. Broadbent] that the house must be open to all comers, in that sense that particular ground has been negatived, as I have said [in Logsdon v. Booth]. In a less wide sense I think it has been hardly negatived but rather explained [by that case]. It has been explained to mean that where the place is so open to all comers that the fact of a person being dirty, possibly infectious, and of a character and appearance likely to disseminate something offensive or dangerous amongst those with whom he is associated, the fact that it is open to people of that class, and that they are not necessarily excluded by reason of their being of that class, is a necessary element. It is one of the things required to bring the house within the mischief of the statute. In that sense it seems, again, that this institution comes within it. . . . There remains one more ground only. . . . It is this—that a "common lodging-house" means a place where people live in common. In Logsdon v. Booth the opinion of the law officers of the Crown . . . was quoted and apparently assented to. The L.C.J. said: "We know of no better description of a common lodging-house than that given by the then law-officers . . . to the effect that a common lodging-house is that class of lodging-house in which persons of the poorer class are received for short periods, and, though strangers to one another, are allowed to inhabit one common room." . . . Now what is the meaning of the passage, "though strangers to one another, are allowed to inhabit one common room"? Counsel for the respondent says "inhabit" necessarily means sleeping, and sleeping in the same room. In Logsdon v. Booth the people did sleep in one common room, and it was not necessary for the learned judges there to consider whether that was an essential element or not, but there is a previous passage in the judgment to this effect: "If large numbers of the most wretched class are sleeping in common rooms, insanitary conditions are, in the absence of inspection, supervision, and control, not unlikely to arise; and it was the object of the law to secure that inspection, supervision and control." I do not think it is necessary for us to say whether or not sleeping in the same bedroom is an essential to making it a common lodging-house. There is of course the case of Langdon v. Broadbent (37 L. T. 434), in which the Court refused to send the case back to the magistrates to have it made clear as to whether the people did sleep in the same bedroom. Therefore, there is some authority for saying that it is not necessary that they should do so. Where the people really occupy separately completely separate apartments, I do not think it would be a common lodging-house. I think this much is necessary—that in order to make it a common lodging-house the people of the character who are admitted must be allowed so to associate with each other as to make the danger of these insanitary conditions likely to arise and likely to spread. If that be the test, and I think it is an important one, we are bound to say that the present institution comes within it. The people do associate with each other in a way entirely within the mischief against which that statute provides. Their living-rooms are all in common, and their sleeping-rooms or apartments are only partially separated. These cubicle arrangements seem to me to be not very much more than curtains dividing the beds. They are apparently so divided for purposes of decency, and not for preventing the spread of infection, nor would they have that effect. They are no more than screens. Taking that view of these facts, I think we are bound to say that, applying what appear to be the principles laid down in Logsdon v. Booth, this institution is also a common lodging-house as the institution of the Salvation Army was. My difficulty has been that this is an institution of a somewhat superior class, there are somewhat better arrangements made for the inmates than in the other case, and a higher sum is charged, although the charge here is not above the charge made, as the case finds, in some common lodging-houses, but it is rather above the average. Further, there are regulations which are intended to have the same effect as regulations under the statute; but I think it is impossible to hold that because the proprietor of what would otherwise be a common lodging-house in effect endeavours himself to carry out the same object which the statute has in view, that therefore it is not a common lodging-house. That would be leaving the proprietor to do something the statute makes compulsory, and it would be impossible to say whether he did it. It seems to me that, although this case is a step beyond Lugsdon v. Booth, yet the step is not one which takes us over the boundary-line which is there laid down as to what is a common lodging-house. I desire to add that it does not appear that much intervention is required in this case, but I do not feel entitled on that ground to say that this institution does not come within the description of "common lodging-house."—pp. 315 et seq.

BLACKBURN, J.—Now the case of Reg. v. Wood has been much pressed upon us. In that case two judges decided one way and one the other: there was, therefore, a very slight majority, but the majority of the Court came to the conclusion that the statute was different in principle to that which I have just expressed as my opinion of it. It seems to have been in the mind of my brother Lush that the reason why French bread was not required to be weighed was because it was an article of luxury, and he seems to have put it to us: that what was an article of luxury at the time the Act of Parliament was passed, and would have been considered very fine and luxurious bread, would be considered very inferior now, and that the Act must mean that the article of luxury which need not be weighed would vary from time to time, and that that which was an article of luxury to our ancestors would become no article of luxury at all to our descendants. I do not think that is the meaning of the Act. I think it means the article that at that time did not require to be weighed, because it was of that description that depended mainly on the shape. If the case of Reg. v. Wood were precisely in point, we should have had to consider whether we should dissent from it, for that we should never do without much thought and consideration, and we should have taken time to consider the matter before we went so far as that, though I am inclined to think that my brother Hannen's opinion is the better one. I do not think our judgment in this case is in conflict with Reg. v. Wood, but I have not disguised the fact that I do not take the same view as the majority of the judges took in that case.—p. 119.

ARCHIBALD, J.—Although I am of opinion that the conviction in this case should be affirmed, and although I agree with my brother Blackburn in not adopting the reasons given by the majority of the Court in the case of Reg. v. Wood, yet in truth our decision is not in conflict with the decision in that case. We are not in any way overruling that case. We proceed upon a different reasoning.—p. 120.

STEPHEN, J.—I gave judgment in Vinter v. Hind, and I think the judgment must have been misunderstood by the magistrates. That case in its circumstances differed from the present case, and turned on a different portion of the sections, and required different things to constitute an offence. I am reported to have said that the words essential to the offence charged were, "Any person who exposes for sale any meat unfit for human food shall be liable to a penalty of 20*l*." But these words do not occur in the portion of sect. 117 with which we are dealing. Here the respondent was in possession of the carcass, and it is not an element of the offence that the carcass should be exposed for sale. There are one or two other passages in the section that may call for comment. Thus the expression "unfit for food of man" is not followed by any proviso that it was so to the knowledge of the person to whom it belonged at the time of sale. The definition of the offence in the case before us does not include the exposure; and I have heard nothing in the respondent's argument which convinces me that a man can be held to be not guilty on the score of ignorance.—p. 36.

RUSSELL, C.J.—I do not feel called upon to express any opinion as to the case of Dyke v. Gower. I think there is a great deal more to be said as to that case than was said, or could properly be expected to be said, by counsel for the appellants, who was attacking it. I do not think there need be a mens rea in order to constitute an offence under the second part of the section. If the article, which was in fact altered by abstraction, was sold without disclosure it would constitute an offence under that section.—p. 147.

HAWKINS, J.—The expression used by me in my judgment in Fortune v. Hanson, that the certificate is "practically conclusive," was intended only to convey the impression I entertained that in the vast majority of cases brought before justices no other evidence was offered of the impurity of the article, and to point out the great importance of insisting upon its containing all the material details of the analysis to enable the justices themselves to form a judgment on the question before them. Had I intended to do more I should have qualified my expression by what I have now stated.—p. 108.

KENNEDY, J.—There the analyst had only told the Court through his certificate that there was 5 per cent. of added water. It was, on the face of it, a mere expression of his opinion to that effect: and the Divisional Court held, in support of the magistrate, that such a form of certificate constituted an insufficient statement in so far as it was a mere expression of an opinion, without any grounds being stated on which the magistrate could form his judgment. There was nothing to show on what ground the conclusion of the analyst was scientifically based. Here, in my judgment, the form of the certificate follows the words of the Act as given in the schedule, so far as it is material. . . . Seeing that this form of certificate has been specially drafted with a view of conforming with the decision in Fortune v. Hanson, and that, as was not done in that case, the analyst has given the scientific data on which his opinion is based,
and not confined himself to stating how much foreign ingredient in the form of "added water" was present in the sample, I think that there has been a sufficient compliance with the Act, while at the same time I entirely maintain the view expressed in the case mentioned, and simply say that this is not a similar case.—p. 230.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Reliance is placed on the decision of Chitty, J. in Cleveland Water Co. v. Redcar Local Board. That decision appears to me perfectly right, and if it had been the other way, the learned judge would have attributed to sect. 52 an operation which he saw, and which I think everybody else sees, was never contemplated by the legislature at all. He had not to deal with what we have here—the extension of waterworks into a new district; he had not that problem before him at all. He had before him the question of whether established waterworks in a particular district were prohibited from extending those waterworks within that same district.—p. 584.

RUSSELL, C.J.—I observe that in Strickland v. Hayes, Lindley, L.J. (sitting as a member of a divisional Court) is reported to have said in effect that by-laws could not create new offences; and that they could only prohibit such acts as would be recognised as offences and prohibited as such by the criminal law. I cannot think that the learned L.J. meant to say, or did say, that the power to make by-laws was restricted to offences already existing and for which a summary method of punishment has already been provided.—p. 119.

LINDLEY, M.R.—What is there in this by-law which can said to be unreasonable or objectionable, having regard to the very wide powers which are given by sect. 23 of the Act? . . . To come within the by-law they (the public) must frequent the street for the purpose of betting. It is said that there is something unreasonable in that. As regards the authorities, Burnett v. Berry and White v. Morley are in favour of the validity of the by-law. We are asked to overrule those cases, but there is no reason for it to my mind. Counsel for the appellant has done what he can to persuade us; but when we come to examine his reasons, they are reduced to this—that the decision (in which I took part) in Strickland v. Hayes goes the whole length of his argument. . . . The difference between that case and this is obvious. In the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, the legislature was not dealing with betting at all, but with street traffic. The whole object of the Act was to regulate the traffic of the metropolis. It is true that they inserted sect. 23 in the Act, and with reference to the traffic they have said that three persons should be deemed to be obstructing the street if they assembled together in any part of it for the purpose of betting. That is the only point that counsel has. I decline to extend or stretch the decision in Strickland v. Hayes, which I think perfectly right, to the length of holding that because there is a provision of that kind in an Act for the regulation of traffic, the County Council have no power to make a by-law for the regulation of the streets with reference to another matter—namely, betting without obstruction.—pp. 28, 29.

Gentel v. Rapps (1901) 71 L. J. K. B. 105; [1902] 1 K. B. 160; 85 L. T. 683; 50 W. R. 216; 66 J. P. 117.—LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., DARLING and CHANNELL, JJ.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—If Strickland v. Hayes is to be understood as meaning more than that a by-law cannot convert an offence which a statute has created into a different offence, it cannot be regarded as law. If the effect of the decision is that a local authority empowered by the legislature to make by-laws for the prevention of nuisances can in no case make a by-law defining a particular act to be a nuisance which would not otherwise be a nuisance, it cannot now be supported. In that case, however, Lindley, L.J. appears to have recognised that a by-law, provided it is not repugnant to the law, may deal with a matter with which the law has not already dealt. He said, "Looking at that section . . . they were made." The judgments in Kruse v. Johnson and the cases relating to by-laws for the suppression of betting, clearly recognise the right of the local authority in making by-laws to define and describe what particular acts will be nuisances in particular circumstances.—p. 108.

COLLINS, J.—The Sheffield Case [infra, col. 1660] appears to me to be an authority directly in point upon this question. . . . At the root of that decision lies the conclusion that the order was sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the magistrate. That being so all distinctions between that case and the present fall to the ground. It is said that here the order in terms referred to the carriage-way as well as the footway; but so in the Sheffield Case the order must by reference to the plan have referred to the land which did not form a part of the street. The only difficulty I have felt arises from Cook v. Ipswich Local Board. There an apportionment was made in which two streets were lumped together. It was disputed and the justices treated it as a nullity, and a fresh apportionment was made. The point was then taken that there was no jurisdiction to make the second apportionment, and upon that the Court held that the first apportionment was to be treated as a nullity. But on examining the case it will be seen that the conclusion that the first apportionment was a nullity was come to by the magistrates sitting as arbitrators. In Shanklin Local Board v. Miller it was so stated in argument by Mr. Archibald, and the view was accepted in terms by the Court. But the matter does not rest there, because in Mayor of Manchester v. Hampson (35 W. R. 335, 591) there is a clear expression of opinion by Manisty, J. that a notice given by a local authority embracing works which the frontagers cannot be legally called upon to do, is only erroneous and not void.—pp. 175, 176.

MATHEW, J.—It was argued for the respondents that the position of a person charged under sect. 150 is similar to that of a person charged with a poor rate, where a warrant must issue as a matter of course, the duty of the magistrate in that case being only ministerial. And they relied on Ex parte Wake as showing that the appellant's remedy was under sect. 268, by appeal to the Local Government Board. But I do not think that Cave, J. intended to lay down such a general proposition as is contended for, and in the Court of Appeal the Master of the Rolls carefully abstained from expressing an opinion that the question of liability cannot be raised before the magistrates.

WRIGHT, J.—The judgment of the M.R. in Sandgate Local Board v. Keene does not contain any expression extending the right (to go to arbitration) to any case except cases in which the apportionment itself is disputed; the other judgments do contain expressions which are consistent with an intention to hold that the right extends to every dispute on any subject; but I think it is implied that there must be a dispute of the apportionment—that is, a dispute, on whatever ground, of the proportion which the party is called upon to pay . . . this construction seems to me to be required by the very terms of the section.—p. 866.

FIELD, J.—The case of Eddleston v. Francis, although at first sight apparently an authority to the contrary, is not so really, for, although the case was decided after the passing of the Local Government Act of 1858, the proceedings in question in that case had taken place before its passing, and the Court upon that ground, declined to apply the 62nd section of the Act to proceedings commenced before its passing.

Leeds Corporation v. Robshaw (1887), 51 J. P. 441.—COLERIDGE, C.J., MELLISH, L.J. and SMITH, J.

A. L. SMITH, J.—It should be noticed that in the Act of 1877, which was the first Act as applicable to Leeds in which, remedy was given by way of summary proceedings, one year was the limit given for such proceedings (see sect. 96), and by the same Act, sect. 109, when it provided for an action being brought by way of debt upon the statute, no limit is mentioned or prescribed. In the face of these two sections, how can it be said that the limitation is the same? . . . But it is said that West Ham Local Board v. Maddams and Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, in the C. A., have held otherwise. Have they? Those cases were decided upon sect. 24 of the Local Government Amendment Act (24 and 25 Vict. c. 61). . . . What the Court of Q. B. held the meaning of this section to be was, that before its enactment the only mode of recovering the expenses being in a summary manner, and, therefore, only recoverable within six months, if the party exercised the option given by the section of proceedings in the County Court, he must do so within the same limit of time, the section expressly stating that proceedings may be taken in the County Court as if such demands were debts within the cognisance of such courts.

SMITH, J.—Speaking for myself, I consider that we are not trenching upon anything we said in the case of the Sandgate Local Board v. Pledge. What we held then was that the magistrates could not go into the validity of the rate when demand was made, and they were called upon to make the ratepayer pay the rate as it appeared upon the face of it, there having been no appeal against the rate itself. What I now think is that the learned magistrate made a mistake in applying the decision of the Sandgate case to the present facts, namely, that when a man is summoned to pay a rate, the magistrates cannot go into the validity of it, which is the matter in dispute; but there was nothing in dispute here when the time came for the appellants to be called upon, as they were, to pay the rate.—p. 43.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—Upon consideration I adopt the view of Stirling, J. [in Ainley v. Kirkheaton Local Board] in preference to the view of Pearson, J. [in Charles v. Finchley Local Board], and I must follow the precedent of Fry, J. [in Att.-Gen. v. Acton Local Board] and decline to grant an injunction which would prohibit the defendants from permitting or allowing fresh connections to be made [with their sewer which discharged sewage upon private property so as to create a nuisance], or, in other words, would oblige the defendants to stop up all future connections. A sanitary authority, in whom sewers are vested, has only a limited property in these sewers. It is not in the same position as an owner of a private sewer, who can absolutely prevent any one from touching his property.—p. 502.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I only wish to say one word about Noyce, In re, to which I was a party. That case has nothing to do with the point argued to-day. All that was decided there was that Mr. Prentice, sitting as a County Court judge who had made a vesting order, and purported to act under sect. 133 [Lunacy Act, 1890], was wrong. The bank had objected to that order, and said that the county court judge had no power to make such an order, because the power of such a judge was prescribed by sect. 132, and anything outside that section the County Court judge had no jurisdiction to deal with in lunacy. We decided that that was so, and the C. A. upheld us. No point was taken there as to the jurisdiction of the judge in lunacy under sects. 128 and 129.—p. 194.

COTTON, L.J.—We have been pressed with Sottomaio, In re. In this case no doubt James, L.J. expressed a clear opinion that the power of the Court to direct an inquiry when the lunacy commenced was not taken away by the Act of 1862. . . . The opinion of James, L.J. is entitled to the highest respect, but in the later case of Stamper, In re (30 Ch. D. 320, n.) . . . the Court held that the inquiry could not be carried back, for that the Act was positive.—p. 322.

WOOD, L.J.—As regards Mordaunt v. Hooper (Ambl. 311), the circumstances of that case were very peculiar, and may be sufficient to take it out of the general rule [that a person claiming by a dry legal title as heir-at-law, and out of possession, could not obtain the appointment of a receiver]; if not, it must be considered as overruled by the later authorities (p. 729) . . . Butler, In re, shows the principle on which the Court proceeds in such cases, and it falls far short of the proposition that after the office of the committee has determined, and his possession of the property has ceased, the gentleman who has been his solicitor cannot act as solicitor for one of the adverse claimants. Rolt, L.J. founded his judgment in the present case [Ferrior, In re] on the principle that the case was reduced to the simple one of three persons claiming adversely to each other as heirs, and that, the office and title of the committee having ceased, there was no jurisdiction to interfere . . . The V.-C. appears to have relied very much on the dictum of Turner, L.J., in Butler, In re, but that dictum cannot be accepted in all its breadth, it must either have been uttered per incuriam, or must have been qualified by circumstances not appearing in the report. His lordship cannot have intended deliberately to lay down as a general rule that a person claiming an estate by a legal title can, by calling upon the tenants to pay their rents to him, entitle himself to apply to this Court for a receiver.—pp. 730, 731.

CAIRNS, L.J.—In Grosvenor v. Drax, the application was made after the death of the lunatic, by the representative of the lunatic, against the committee; and it is an observation which has been frequently made, and justly, as I apprehend, that it was sufficient for the determination of that case to say that the jurisdiction in lunacy was at an end, and that if any right could be asserted against the committee it must be asserted in some other form. Accordingly, the order of Her Majesty in Council, reversing the order made in the Court below, made that reversal distinctly without prejudice to any other proceeding which the respondent might be advised to institute. In Ponsonby, In re, the expressions used by Lord St. Leonards are certainly very large, and but for them I myself should have thought that Grosvenor v. Drax had not gone to such an extent. . . . It [Fitzgerald, In re (supra, col. 1672)] has really no bearing upon the point, and only amounts to a statement of what I suppose is very clear, that the committee of the estate (not of the person) who accepts his office on the condition that he should always account, must account accordingly. As to Jodrell, In re, it seems to amount to this, that a specific sum was to be handed over by the committee of the estate to the committee of the person to pay for the outfit of a member of the lunatic's family; it was asserted that the payment had not been made, and the committee of the estate was held entitled to apply against the committee of the person to find out what had become of the money which had been handed over for that specific purpose.—p. 539.

ROMER, J.—Grosvenor v. Drax is dealt with by Lord Cairns in French, In re, and I need not again refer to it. But with regard to Ponsonby, In re, I think the observations made by Lord St. Leonards, when he said of Grosvenor v. Drax, that the great lawyers in the P. C. who decided that case, decided that the committee was entitled to retain the savings of the lunatic's maintenance, must be considered with reference to the ordinary case where the committee has duly maintained the lunatic for the full period for which the allowance was made, and no case has been made against the committee of having not properly applied the allowance in accordance with the provisions of the scheme under which the order was made, or having not properly maintained the lunatic. I do not think Lord St. Leonards could have intended to lay down the general proposition that when once the committee has received the lunatic's money, he is under no circumstances bound to account for the money so received.—p. 584.

LINDLEY, L.J. (for self, LOPES and A. L. SMITH.

L.J.J.).—But for the charging order, it is clear that the creditor would have no right to be paid out of the lunatic's estate in Court or under the protection of a judge in lunacy. This is plain from Pink, In re, and a long series of order authorities; and in Pountain, In re, the Court appointed a receiver to protect the property of a lunatic not so found by inquisition against (inter alia) execution by a judgment creditor. . . . The effect of a charging order against a lunatic was considered by this Court in Leavesley, In re; but there the lunatic was dead, and after his death the Court gave effect to the order as against his executors. The Court, however, carefully abstained from expressing any opinion on what would have been done in his lifetime. In Pountain's Case, referred to in Leavesley, In re ([1891] 2 Ch. 3), however, the Court had to deal with the very point before us. In Horne v. Pountain, a judgment creditor of the lunatic obtained a charging order upon a fund standing to the credit of the lunatic in the books of the paymaster of the Chancery Division. The judgment creditor applied in lunacy for payment, but his application was refused. The statement in the Law Reports ([1891] 2 Ch. 3) proves to be correct. This I have ascertained from the registrar's book. From a note in that book, however, it appears that the order sought to be enforced may have been the order made in chambers, and not the order as rectified by the Divisional Court. But inasmuch as the L.J.J. had before them the order of the Divisional Court which is recited in their own order, I cannot think that their refusal to order payment was based upon so technical a mistake, which might have been at once put right by an amendment.—p. 335.

LINDLEY, L.J.—in that case [Farnham, In re

(post, col. 1692)] the property was claimed by the trustee in bankruptcy, by which it was under our control. The property consisted of plate, and was in the hands of the Lunacy Court, and the trustee asked that it should be given up to him. That was quite a different matter. We said, "No. We have it in our hands for the benefit of the lunatic, and we will not part with it." In the course of that judgment there may be words which apply to the present question, but now the tables are turned. We are not asserting a right to retain property already in our custody, as on that occasion, when we had the plate ourselves, and had clear jurisdiction to deal with it. Our observations were addressed to that state of things. I have looked in vain in the Lunacy Act and the Bankruptcy Act, and have found nothing to show that we have any jurisdiction in the present case. Counsel for the trustee has called my attention to Brockwell v. Bullock, where an elaborate judgment was given by Fry, L.J., who went into the whole question, and held that there was no jurisdiction in lunacy to restrain any proceedings taken in another Court. It does not quite stop there, for under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 51, as explained in Platt, In re, we are authorised to act as additional judges of the Chancery Division. Thus the lunacy judges have power to sit as judges of the High Court, but that will not assist the committee in this case: for sitting as judges of the High Court we cannot interfere with the jurisdiction of the County Court. It is true that there is a right of appeal from the County Court in bankruptcy to the Divisional Court, and by special leave to this Court under the Bankruptcy Appeals (County Courts) Act, 1884 (47 Vict. c. 9), s. 2, which repealed sect. 104 of the Act of 1883; but putting that and the effect of the Judicature Act and the decision in Platt, In re, together, we are of opinion that we have no power to do what we are asked to do, and the summons must be dismissed.—p. 457.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—Plenderleith, In re, and Winkle, In re . . . seem to me to decide this:—that when once property has come under the jurisdiction of lunacy, the requirements of the lunatic for maintenance are to be considered before the rights of any execution creditor . . . but here the Court in lunacy has not yet taken these funds under its protection. The committee is not in the same position as a receiver.—p. 235.

ALVERSTONE, M.R.—It is said that Winkle, In re shows that when the property of a lunatic has become subject to the control of the Court by the appointment of a receiver, this would prevent a charge on the property from being effective. In my opinion the Court in that case did not decide anything of the kind. If we thought that they did it is doubtful if we should have followed the case to that length. . . . What the Court decided in Winkle, In re, was that on their view of the facts of that case there was no charge on the goods which put the goods in the possession of the judgment creditor, or gave him a lien on the goods at the time when the lunatic's wife took possession. Dealing with that case in Clarke, In re, Lindley, M.R. said: "Even if an order appointing a receiver related back, which it never does, the receiver has never in fact been in possession of the goods. This circumstance distinguishes this case from Winkle, In re, where the receiver had possession and the sheriff had not, he having gone out of possession under an order of a judge at chambers. The judgment of the Court proceeded entirely on this ground, and Winkle, In re, is no authority for saying that the Court in lunacy can deprive execution creditors of their rights over property not under the control of the Court when seized under legal process." . . . There is a long line of authorities referred to by Lindley, M.R., showing that an order like this made under sect. 116 [Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5)] is only intended to authorise the receiver to take possession of the property of the lunatic and not to interfere with the rights of third parties.—p. 646.

CHITTY, J.—The nature of the jurisdiction in lunacy is well explained in Oxenden v. Compton (Lord) (supra): it is only a power of administration. . . . It is said that Giffard, L.J., when V.-C., in Jones v. Green, made some observations which show that the L.C. intrusted in lunacy can give a direction in the order for sale that the proceeds of the property converted shall belong to the persons who would have been the owners of the property if it had remained unconverted. There is, no doubt, a statement to that effect in the judgment, but no authority has been produced to me which justifies that dictum; and, moreover, against that dictum I must cite the dictum of Cotton, L.J., in Barker, In re, where he says: "With regard to the payment into Court in the lunacy, without carrying it to a real estate account, that, in my opinion, ought not to alter the rights of the parties. The money must be dealt with without reference to the account to which it has been carried, and as if there had been no such carrying over at all. Indeed, the carrying it to a real estate account would not alter the rights at all, but simply call the attention of the Court, when the money is paid out, to the fact that a question arises about it, and that, instead of being, as apparently it is, cash, it is to be considered whether it does not still preserve the character of real estate." That is the opinion at which I have arrived upon the order before me, and with great respect to Giffard, L.J., I think that Cotton, L.J.'s dictum is to be preferred. . . . The decision in Leeming, In re, so far as it requires explanation, may be explained by reference to the 118th section [Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853]: but the case really explains itself. The order made in that case was that the amount due on a mortgage of real estate created by the lunatic's ancestor, should be paid out of the fund in Court standing to the credit of the lunacy, this fund having arisen from the lunatic's personal estate: but the order was made without prejudice to the question how the mortgage debt ought ultimately to be borne. The order also directed the mortgage to be kept on foot. Upon the question reserved coming before the Court for decision, it was held that the mortgage being an incumbrance on the real estate, the mortgage debt ought to be raised out of the real estate.—pp. 626, 627.

EARL OF SELBORN, E.—Some of the older authorities, applicable to cases in which the investment has been unauthorized, are referred to in the first volume of Sir E. Williams' book on Executors and Administrators (7th edition), pp. 666 and 667. Two of these were cases of infants (Gibson v. Scudamore (1726) 1 Dick. 45, and Witter v. Witter (1730) 3 P. Wms. 99): and one, that of a lunatic (reported under the name of Lord Plymouth, as Committee, in Freeman's Ch. R., p. 114, and under the title of Awdley v. Awdley in 2 Vern. 193 (supra)). In Gibson v. Scudamore the Court treated the purchase-money as in equity charged on the estate. In Witter v. Witter the same L.C. (Lord King) said: "The renewed lease, though for lives, shall follow the nature of the original one, and go to the executors or administrators of the infant, as that should have done. . . . This might and ought to have been declared in trust for the executors and administrators of the infant, if he should die during infancy." Lord King there pointed out, as proper to preserve the personal character of the right during infancy, the same form which was afterwards used by the Court in Bridges v. Bridges in 1752 [Seton on Decrees, 2nd edition, p. 345]; and which was followed with approval by Lord Eldon in 1801 (in Ashburton v. Ashburton, 6 Ves. 7; 5 R. R. 201) expressly to prevent the Court from "changing the nature of the property." That form was for a long period of time, and under very great judges, sanctioned by the general course of the Court of Chancery in such cases. I do not see how your lordships could now hold a trust, declared in such terms, to be ineffectual for the preservation of the personal right, with its proper incidents (of which the devolution of the equitable title to executors or administrators was certainly not the least important, nor the least distinctly in view), without practically declaring that all those judges were mistaken, and that the course of the Court of Chancery, in those cases, proceeded upon a misconception of the powers of the Court, and of the effect in equity of what it authorised to be done. In the old lunacy case, as reported by Freeman, the Lords Commissioners (in 1690) held "that the administrator should have the benefit of the purchase, and not the heir; for if the money had not been laid out, it had been clear that the administrator should have had it; and if laying out the money would alter the case, then it would be in the power of the grantee of the custody to prefer the heir or administrator as he pleased;" and they said: "This Court may either follow the land purchased or the estate of my Lord Plymouth." The report of the same case in Vernon [Raithby's edition, vol. ii., p. 194, n.] gives an extract from the decree, which declared, "that it was not in the power of any committee to alter the nature of a lunatic's estate;" and adds that the decree, in effect, declared the money laid out in the purchase to be a charge on the land.—p. 682.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—This is no new doctrine. In substance it is to be found in the Statute de Prerogativa Regis [17 Edw. 2, c. 10], which has been construed as impliedly forbidding the investment of a lunatic's personal estate in the purchase of land: Awdley v. Awdley. Lord Hardwicke lays down the rule. . . . In Annandale, Ex parte (supra, col. 1677), he says: "In cases of lunacy the first care of the Court is the maintenance of the lunatic, and after that it is a rule never departed from not to vary or change the property of the lunatic so as to effect any alteration as to the succession to it." In 1772, in a case which was much considered (Grimstone, Ex parte, col. 1677), Lord Bathurst expresses himself as follows: "It was said to be a general rule that the Court will not alter the lunatic's property to the prejudice of his successor. Rightly understood, it is true. The Court will not buy or sell land for him, but in the management of the estate the governing principle is the interest of the lunatic" (p. 688). . . . [After quoting James L.J.'s observations in Barker, In re (supra), his lordship continued:] In dealing with the property of lunatics, in late years at any rate, and since the [Lunacy Regulation] Act of 1853, the Court has given effect to the rule in cases which at first sight appear to lie rather on the line, and which might possibly have been dealt with differently but for the Act. I will only refer to two instances. In Leeming, In re (supra), a mortgage created by the ancestor of the lunatic was paid off out of the lunatic's personal estate. The mortgage was kept alive, and on the death of the lunatic, intestate, it was held that the sum expended out of the personal estate in paying off the mortgage ought to be raised out of the real estate comprised in the mortgage and dealt with as personal estate. In Ryder, In re, the Court sanctioned the enfranchisement of a copyhold estate belonging to a lunatic, but as the descent of copyholds in the manor was different from the descent of freeholds, the Court made a declaration for the purpose of carrying the equitable interest in the enfranchised copyholds, in the event of the lunatic dying intestate, to the persons who would have taken the property if it had not been enfranchised. In making the order the late M.R., referring of course to cases outside the ordinary course of management, observed that it was "a settled principle in lunacy that the Court would not alter the rights of succession to the lunatic's property" (p. 690). . . . The Court is guided by the same principles and speaks in the same language, whether it is sitting in Chancery or in lunacy. The origin of the Crown having the custody of idiots and lunatics is as Lord Bathurst said in Grimstone, Ex parte, "more matter of curiosity than use." He adds that it certainly existed before the Statute de Prerogativa Regis, and that "after custody is granted the Great Seal acts in matters relative to the lunatic not under the sign manual, but by virtue of its general power as keeper of the King's conscience." The observations of Lord Redesdale in Fitzgerald, In re (supra), col. 1672, are to the same effect. Now the order of the L.J.J. [in the present case] was not a novel experiment in lunacy administration, nor was it couched in language unfamiliar to Courts of equity. In Simon Degge's Case (supra), it appears that the lunatic was entitled to a freehold lease held for three lives, of which the lunatic was ultimately the survivor. On the dropping of each of the other two lives, the lease was renewed under the order of the Court, and the fines and charges were paid out of the lunatic's personal estate. On each occasion it was ordered, in the one case by Lord Hardwicke, in the other by Lord Northampton, that the interest in the renewed lease during the life added was to be considered as part of the lunatic's personal estate for the benefit of his next of kin. Those orders were commented on, by Sir E. Sugden in Leitrim v. Ebery, and certainly he appears to treat them as well founded and effectual for the purpose of preserving the character of the lunatic's estate.

In Elmer's Pract. in Lunacy, 6th edition, p. 206, a precedent is given of an order sanctioning the purchase of a house for the residence of a lunatic. It orders "that the property to be so purchased, be deemed and taken to be part of the personal estate of the lunatic." It directs that the conveyance be made to trustees "upon trust for the lunatic, his executors, administrators, and assigns." . . . Turning now to the practices in the Court of Chancery, we find in Seton on Decrees, 3rd edition, vol. ii., p. 692, a precedent on precisely the same lines, which was in use in the Court of Chancery for some hundred years. It is the form of order employed before the Wills Act, when real estate was purchased with personality belonging to an infant. The object was to preserve the character of the property, and thus to enable the owner, though an infant, notwithstanding the outward form of the property, to deal with it by will. That precedent had the sanction of Lord Eldon, and seems to have been uniformly adopted by him when the occasion required it. See Ashburton v. Ashburton; Ware v. Polhill ((1805) 11 Ves. 278; 8 R. R. 144). The efficacy of the precedent was never questioned. If such an order was efficacious in the case of an infant, why is it futile, or less efficacious, in the case of a lunatic?—p. 692.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In re, was a peculiar case. We were asked to sanction a covenant by the committee of a lunatic to pay money not for debts of his own, but other people's debts, and we doubted whether that could be done, and would not do it. Certainly there are passages in the report which look at first as if Cotton, L.J. thought there was no power to do it. I doubt myself whether we intended to go that length; and if we did, we put an uncommonly narrow construction on sect. 116 [Lunacy Act, 1853], and one not likely to be abided by.—p. 318.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The only authority referred to on the question whether the debts of the lunatic and the expenses of her past maintenance can be deducted in ascertaining the amount of her property is Adams, In re, before Lord Westbury. The facts of that case can only be come at by comparing the different reports. Lord Westbury laid it down that the word "property" in the Act must be taken to mean beneficial property clear of debts. The report in 4 De G. J. & S. does not state the nature of the debts, and on referring to the Weekly Reporter I find it stated that they were debts of ancestors of the person of unsound mind. From the report in the Law Times, however, it appears that the property of the lunatic consisted of a moiety of a real estate subject to a mortgage, the net income of his share of which, after payment of interest on the mortgage debt, was 43*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.* and of real estate derived from his father of the value of 820*l.*, subject to so much of the father's debts, amounting to 891*l.*, as the father's personal estate, amounting to 350*l.*, was insufficient to pay, leaving a surplus value of 289*l.* In this state of circumstances the property must clearly have been of a value exceeding 1,000*l.*, unless the claims against the lunatic's estate for past maintenance and simple contract debts, which are stated to have amounted to 330*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.*, were to be deducted. In the New Reports the statement of the property is somewhat different, but there, also, it appears that the property could only be brought below the limit by deducting the past maintenance. The case therefore is an authority for the position that in estimating the value of a lunatic's property for the purposes of the 12th section [Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862], his debts and the expenses of his past maintenance are to be deducted. This seems reasonable, for the object of the section was to provide a cheap way of applying the lunatic's property for his benefit when it was below a certain amount, and there is just as much reason for such a jurisdiction where the balance, after making these deductions, is below 1,000*l.*, as where the whole property is below that amount.—p. 308.

JAMES, L.J.—There must be some mistake in the case cited as to the power of a judge of the Ch. Div. to appoint a guardian to a person of unsound mind. The Ch. STIRLING, J.—The difficulty which appeared to my mind, when I desired the summons, so far as it asked for transfer of the corpus of the fund, to be adjourned for discussion in Court, was that presented by Barlow's Will, In re, and I am bound to say that there are expressions of the C. A. which would have presented some difficulty to my mind if it had not been for Brown, In re. The decision in that case is not in point, because it was an appeal to the statutory jurisdiction of the Court under the Lunacy Act, 1890. But the importance of it is that it contains a full discussion by Lindley, L.J. of the previous cases, including Barlow's Will, In re. He says: "If now we turn to previous decisions, we find that orders have been made transferring stocks, funds, and securities to curators of lunatics resident out of England, namely, in France, Holland, and Scotland, although the property of such lunatics was not vested in their curators in the strict technical sense of that expression"; so that he recognises the fact that the transfer may be made, although the property is not vested in the person to whom it will be transferred. Then dealing with Barlow, In re, he says, "The Master in Lunacy, appointed by the Supreme Court of New South Wales under the New South Wales Lunacy Act, applied for a transfer to him of the sum of 2,249*l.* 18*s.* New Three Per Cent. Annuities belonging to the lunatic, and paid into Court under the Trustee Relief Act. The lunatic there was not judicially declared lunatic, and the Court held, first, that the Colonial Master had no absolute right to have the whole sum transferred to him, but an order was nevertheless made for the payment to him of part of the capital, namely, 803*l.*, and of the future dividends. The lunatic in that case was only a patient not judicially declared to be insane, and the Court felt considerable difficulty in making any order at all for payment to the Colonial Master." Now what have we here? Really, in substance, though not in form, it is a request from the Court of Bavaria asking me to direct a transfer.—p. 296.

LINDLEY, M.R.—In Brown, In re, the Court placed an extensive rather than a restrictive construction on the meaning of the words, "vested in a person appointed for the management thereof"; and having regard to that decision, I think we are quite right in saying that the personal property of this lady has become "vested" in the petitioner within the true meaning of the section [sect. 134 of the Lunacy

Act, 1890] and the decision in Brown, In re. . . The real truth is, that the right of the Court over lunatics who have property within its jurisdiction cannot be ousted by such ambiguous words as we find in sect. 131. The point to some extent was considered in Brown, In re, where it was said that the Court must be cautious not to hand over the property unless satisfied that a proper case was made out, and the Court was satisfied there that the property was in fact required for the maintenance and support of the lunatic.—p. 138.

KAY, J., after discussing the cases other than Carter v. Beard, continued.—Then there is Gibson, In re (supra), in which Mellish, L.J. says in the course of the argument: "A lunatic cannot contract for his maintenance, so whoever maintains him becomes a creditor by implied contract." I have read a considerable body of authority in support of that proposition. . . . But in Weaver, In re (supra, col. 1674), the late M.R., sitting in the C.A., commenting on that statement of Mellish, L.J., which was read in argument by the counsel for the respondents, says: "That is only an interlocutory observation. It is difficult to see how there can be an implied contract with a lunatic, if he is incompetent to make an express contract. It is not always safe to report interlocutory observations of judges, they are very liable to be misunderstood." If I may respectfully say so, the reporter ought to have remembered that before he reported the interlocutory observation of the late M.R.—p. 100.

COTTON, L.J.—I think that the expression "implied contract" is erroneous and very unfortunate. In . . . Weaver, In re, the question whether there could be what has been called an implied contract by a lunatic, was left undecided by the Court, and one of the judges said that it was difficult to see how there could be an implied contract on the part of a lunatic if he was himself incompetent to make an express contract. But we all agree with the view that I have thus expressed [that the law implies an obligation to repay money spent in supplying necessities] in order to prevent any doubt from arising in consequence of our having declined to settle the question in the case to which I have alluded.—p. 105.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question whether an implied obligation arises in favour of a person who supplies a lunatic with necessities is a question of law, and in Weaver, In re, a doubt was expressed whether there is any obligation on the part of the lunatic to repay. I confess I cannot participate in that doubt. I think that doubt has arisen from the unfortunate terminology of our law, owing to which the expression "implied contract" has been used to denote not only a genuine contract established by inference, but also an obligation which does not arise from any real contract, but which can be enforced as if it had a contractual origin. Obligations of this class are called by civilians obligationes quasi ex contractu. But that a lunatic's estate may be made liable for necessities was treated as settled as long ago as Manby v. Scott ((1603) 1 Sid. 112), where three learned judges, after holding that an infant might be bound for necessities provided for him, said, "and what has been said of an infant is applicable to an idiot in case of house-keeping."—p. 107.

ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—Richards, Ex parte, . . . disposes of this case. If I had originally to decide this question, I should not have so decided it. Though that case has been doubted, yet I find it has been so repeatedly followed that I do not feel myself at liberty to alter the practice. I do not, however, approve of it, thinking it contrary to principle, and opposed to the settled rule that the costs occasioned by the mortgagee putting the mortgaged estate in settlement are to be borne by the mortgagor.—p. 760.

STUART, V.-C.—It has been said, however, that there are cases in this Court in which a different doctrine has prevailed, and in which the Court has made decrees and dealt with a mortgagee's right in such a way as to make his claim to depend upon the question whether, at the time of the contract, the person alleged to be a lunatic was so. Snook v. Watts is stated to be a case of that kind. It would seem, from the report of that case, that the Court had not before it all the authorities which would require consideration before it decided that the right of the mortgagee depended on the fact of the sanity of the mortgagor. No doubt Lord Langdale, in directing an issue in that case, countenanced the notion that he entertained that view. Being an issue, it excluded every question but that of sanity or insanity. An action would have been a different matter, for according to the law as settled by the Ex. Ch. in Molton v. Camroux (1849) 18 L. J. Ex. 356; 4 Ex. 17, see "ANNUITY", and this Court, it would depend on circumstances, whether, notwithstanding the lunacy, the contract was invalid. It seems to me that Snook v. Watts, if it supports the proposition in favour of which it has been cited, is entirely at variance with the law of contract both at law and in equity. I cannot consider that Jacobs v. Richards ought to govern my decision. In that case there was wanting, what I have here—the proof of circumstances which might have come out in an action which the plaintiff, under the decree of the Court, was to bring, and I can well understand that the L.J.J. satisfied that mere lunacy would not avoid a contract, might consider that, in the action, circumstances might appear which would enable them to deal completely with the question before them.—p. 616.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In that case an application was made under sect. 116, sub-sect. 2 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, not for an order to lease, but for an order to "sell property belonging to the lunatic," she having only a life estate therein; and this Court held that the applicant could not bring that case within that sub-section because the property did not "belong" to the lunatic, she having only a life interest therein; and that he could not bring the case within the provisions of sect. 62 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, because that section only applied to a tenant for life who was a lunatic so found by inquisition, which Martha Baggs was not; and this Court therefore held that it was a case not provided for by either the Lunacy Act of 1890 or the Settled Land Act of 1882.—p. 153.

LINDLEY, LOPES and DAVEY, L.JJ.

DAVEY, L.J.—Our decision in Baggs, In re, was that in consequence of the language used in the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 62, the powers of that Act could not be exercised on behalf of a lunatic tenant for life, except where he was a lunatic so found by inquisition, and there was a committee. That case has no application to the present one.—p. 418.

GRANWORTH, L.C.—The committee sometimes has interests adverse to those of a lunatic, and then a guardian is appointed specially to conduct the defence. In such a case it is clear that neither the committee nor the special guardian can make admissions binding on the lunatic. All principle seems to me to be against the power contended for, and I have discovered no authority in favour of it, except Leving v. Caverly, the reasoning in which is so unsatisfactory, not to say absurd, that I think it would be impossible to follow it.—p. 273.

Watt v. Leach (1878) 26 W. R. 475.

MALINS, V.-C., assumed that Halfhide v. Robinson was correctly decided at the date of that decision, and therefore that, in 1874, a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition could not institute an action by his next friend where real estate was affected. But in 1876 the legislature had passed 39 & 40 Vict. c. 17, s. 6, under which the next friend of such a person might "request a sale," and, that being so, the next friend might also institute an action for sale, the section having to that extent altered the law since the decision in Halfhide v. Robinson.

COTTON, L.J.—No doubt Halfhide v. Robinson causes a difficulty, but James, L.J. does not lay down that there can be no bill filed for partition by a person of unsound mind by his next friend. He only asks the question: Is there any authority for it? I asked the question once or twice, whether there was any authority one way or the other, but no authority could be produced. The difficult question is, whether we are not bound by what was said by James, L.J. at the end of his judgment: "I wish it to be understood that a bill cannot be filed by a next friend on behalf of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition, for dealing with his real estate. The consequences of such a course might be monstrous." . . . The case came before James, L.J. in a very peculiar way. . . . The Court was not asked to carry out an order for sale made in a partition action. Apparently the application was not under any of the provisions of the Act, it was a petition presented in the suit, not for carrying the decree into effect, but for vesting the share of the person who was of unsound mind in one of the other parties to the action. Taking the judgment of James, L.J. reasonably, I think he only meant that the course taken was not the proper course, but that there should be a petition to the L.J. under the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862, and then the Court might make the order. —p. 428.

BOWEN, L.J., after discussing Beall v. Smith and Jones v. Lloyd, continued: I entirely concur in the view which Cotton, L.J. has taken of that case [Halfhide v. Robinson]. . . . I do not fail to observe that in that particular case the person who was of unsound mind and sued by his next friend, was the sole plaintiff, and the history of the case and what took place in the course of the litigation was no doubt the pivot on which the reasoning in the mind of James, L.J. turned.—p. 432. And see post, cols. 1693, 1695.

STIRLING, J.—It was said that Shadwell, V.-C. in Hartley v. Gilbert, held that to take or continue proceedings in a suit after a petition in lunacy had been presented against the party was in one sense a fraud upon the lunacy jurisdiction. . . . The V.-C. there does use the word "fraud," but it does not seem to me that he meant to go the length of saying that a solicitor who believed his client to be sane could not take proceedings in the name of the client if he knew that a petition in lunacy against the client had been presented. If that were so, it might be very disadvantageous to the client. All that that case goes to, in my opinion, is that the Court, when informed of the petition, will in a proper case stay the proceedings until the inquiry into the state of mind of the party has been completed. . . . In that case [Beall v. Smith], after the inquisition had been held, proceedings in the name of the lunatic were prosecuted without the committee being communicated with, and the C.A. held that there had been professional misconduct on the part of the solicitor. I am bound by the decision in that case. Moreover, I agree with what was laid down in it, and in no way desire to dissent from it. In the present case, when the proceedings were instituted there had been no inquisition, and the case is only relied upon because James, L.J. in his judgment said: "There is no decision that it" (a suit) "can go on in the interval between the inquisition and the appointment, and Shadwell, V.-C. expressed a clear opinion that going on even after the commencement of proceedings in lunacy would be a fraud on the jurisdiction." The L.J. there adopts the language of Shadwell, V.-C., who, as I have said, used the word "fraud" in a qualified sense.—p. 260.

LINDLEY, M.R. (for self, RIGBY and V. WILLIAMS, L.J.).—If, before the Judicature Acts, an action at law had been brought in the name of such a person [i.e., of unsound mind] to enforce a purely legal demand—say, an action on a covenant, or of debt detain, or trover—there would have been no defence to the action on the ground that the plaintiff on the record was of unsound mind. No plea in bar or in abatement applicable in such a case is to be found in the books. Such an action might, perhaps, have been stayed on an application showing that the action was an abuse of the process of the Court—that is, was brought in the plaintiff's name without his authority—see Waterhouse v. Worsnop, which, however, was since the Judicature Act. Such an action could certainly have been stayed by proceedings in lunacy and the appointment of a committee. Unless the action were stayed it would proceed to trial in the ordinary way, and on proof of the plaintiff's case judgment would have been entered for the plaintiff on the record and execution issued accordingly—see Dennis v. Dennis. If the plaintiff had sued by attorney payment or delivery to him would have discharged the defendant or sheriff. If the plaintiff had sued in person a difficulty would obviously have arisen. An application to stay execution on payment into Court might, we apprehend, have been successfully made; or the Court could, as in Gleddon v. Trebble, have ordered payment to his next friend, and so the necessity of instituting proceedings in lunacy would be avoided—see generally Collinson on Lunatics, vol. i., pp. 339, &c. In Chancery it had long been the settled practice to institute suits in the names of lunatics not so found by inquisition by a next friend. Applications to stay such suits were also frequently made with success. See generally on such suits, Jones v. Lloyd, Beall v. Smith, Farnham v. Milward, and Armstrong (George) & Sons, In re. The alleged lunatic could make such an application himself if he asserted his sanity, and anyone willing to act as next friend could make it in the alleged lunatic's name, as in Howell v. Lewis. Even the defendant might apply—see Wartnaby v. Wartnaby and Porter v. Porter, per Cotton, L.J. When a lunatic was so found by inquisition, the Court of Chancery would stay a suit instituted in his name until the appointment of a committee—see Hartley v. Gilbert. We are not aware of any case in which a foreign curator has been held to be an improper next friend of the person whose curator he is. . . . It is well settled that until the Crown interferes, or at all events until its interference is invoked by a petition for an inquisition or by an application for the appointment of a receiver, the prerogative of the Crown has no practical effect. In other words, no person can avail himself of that prerogative without taking the proper steps to induce the Crown to exercise it. This point was examined by this Court last summer, when Seager Hunt's Case (supra, col. 1685) was before it. In the present case no lunacy proceedings have been taken in this country; nor was any attempt made to stay the action (p. 449). . . . [The M.B. then discussed Scott v. Bentley (supra, col. 1690) and continued:] Scott v. Bentley has been questioned mainly because it proceeded to some extent on the supposed authority of a decision of the H. L. on an appeal from Scotland, Morison's Lunacy, In re (supra, col. 1690). This case appears to have been to some extent misunderstood. The V.-C. refers to it as an unreported case cited in Johnstone v. Beattie (1843) 10 Cl. & F. 42; affirming 10 L. J. Ch. 309; 1 Ph. 17) and in Sill v. Worswick (1791) 1 H. Bl. 665). In Johnstone v. Beattie, Lord Brougham refers to Morison's Case, as cited in the note to Sill v. Worswick, and as an authority for the proposition that the legally appointed curator in one country was held entitled to act in another. This it is plain was also Wood, V.-C.'s view of Morison's Case, as is apparent from his remarks that in Morison's Case the curator sued alone. But the reports of that case to which we have been referred, show that the decision of the H. L. in Morison's Case did not go that length, and Lord Campbell was not satisfied that it did—see 10 Cl. & F. 133. We understand the decision as showing that a committee appointed in England of a Scotchman resident in England could not sue in Scotland simply in his own name and as committee for the recovery of the lunatic's personal estate; but that such committee could sue there in the name of the lunatic for the recovery of the lunatic's personal estate. Morison's Case, therefore, did not go so far as Wood, V.-C. thought, but it goes a long way to show that the proceedings in this action are properly framed. . . . In Scott v. Bentley, Wood, V.-C. did not by any means base his judgment only on the supposed decision in Morison's Case, and after making every allowance for his misapprehension of that case, Scott v. Bentley was, in our opinion, well decided, although we cannot help thinking that if Wood, V.-C. had known the form of the order made in Morison's Case, he would have directed the bill to be amended by making it in form a bill by the lunatic by his curator and next friend. In Alivon v. Furnival, Parke, B. expressed a clear opinion to the effect that a foreign curator could sue here in his own name for goods and chattels of a person of unsound mind. Scott v. Bentley is consistent, and is really supported by several other cases cited by counsel for the plaintiffs, of which Tarratt, In re (supra, col. 1685); De Linden, In re (supra, col. 1684); Thiery v. Chalmers, Guthrie & Co. (supra, col. 1685) are the most recent and important. [His lordship then discussed De Linden, In re, and Thiery v. Chalmers, Guthrie & Co. and continued:] Kekewich, J. [Thiery v. Chalmers, Guthrie & Co.] thought that the tuteur might have sued alone in his own name. He regarded the decision in Brown, In re (supra, col. 1684), as an authority for so holding, inasmuch as in Brown, In re, and in Thiery v. Chalmers, Guthrie & Co., the lunatic had been formally so declared by the foreign Court. But Brown, In re, was not an action; it was an application to the Court in lunacy under sect. 134 of the Lunacy Act, and we doubt whether the action of Thiery v. Chalmers, Guthrie & Co. would have been rightly framed if brought by the tuteur as sole plaintiff. An alteration in the status of a lunatic appears to be necessary in order to enable the Court in lunacy to exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon it by sect. 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890; but it by no means follows that persons, whose status has not been altered by their being judicially declared lunatic, cannot sue by themselves by a next friend for the recovery of their own property. Knight, In re (supra), col. 1684, turned on the discretion which the Court had under sect. 134 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and throws no real light on this case. The only difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs is occasioned by Barlow's Will, In re (supra), col. 1684). . . . It is to be observed that the general statutory authority given by the colonial Act to the Master as an officer of the colonial Court was not supplemented by any order giving the Master any express authority as the lunatic's attorney to get in any property not locally within the jurisdiction of the Court; and, as we understand Cotton, L.J.'s judgment, he was much influenced by the omission of any such order. If the Master's authority derived from the colonial statute was unsatisfactory, it is obvious that such authority was not improved by his assumption of the right to use the lunatic's name. In that view of the case the fact that the lunatic petitioned in her own name by her next friend did not remove the difficulty. Having decided that the Master was not entitled as a matter of right to demand payment to himself, it became necessary for the Court, acting as trustees, to consider what it was the duty of trustees to do in such a case as that before them, and they considered that in such a case the trustees ought not to part with the trust fund without seeing to its application, and ought not to part with the fund to the Master further than they were satisfied that the interests of the lunatic rendered it necessary to do so. This was the view taken in Garnier, In re (supra), col. 1686), where, however, the lunatic was a domiciled Englishman; and we see no reason to dissent from it where the authority of the foreign curator to get in the trust property is regarded by the Court as unsatisfactory. But where it is not, the considerations which weighed with the Court in Barlow's Will, In re, do not arise.—pp. 452—454.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—Now, if the lady had been domiciled in New York, the decision of the C.A. in Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank (supra) would have been a direct authority. But the M.R. says in his judgment in that case, "If, as in Garnier, In re (supra), col. 1686), the lunatic were an Englishman temporarily abroad, and confined as a lunatic abroad, we should feel considerable difficulty in holding that the Courts of this country were bound to recognise the title of a foreign curator to sue in this country." The point thus left open now arises for my decision. The lady sues by a next friend as provided by Ord. XVI. r. 17, which refers to the old practice of the Ch. Div. There is nothing in that order or in the established practice of the Court of Chancery prior to that order, which entitles the next friend—who may be anybody—to receive and give a discharge for the lady's money. It is only on the footing that the action is for the benefit of the lady, and in so far as it is for her benefit, that the Court allows such an action to proceed—see Light v. Light, Beall v. Smith, Jones v. Lloyd, and Porter v. Porter. . . . I am not satisfied that the lady suing by her next friend can as a matter of strict right insist upon such payment, but in the exercise of my discretion I can see no reason why the order should not be made in the present case. . . . Scott v. Bentley (supra), col. 1690), as explained and corrected by the C.A. in Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank, seems to me to warrant the view which, apart from authority, I should be prepared to adopt.—p. 331. And see Lahiff, In re (1903) [1904] 1 Ir. R. 147.—C.A.

BRETT, M.R.—In Johnson v. Emerson, it was suggested by Martin, B. that under the present law as to bankruptcy an action could not be maintained for falsely and maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, procuring an adjudication in bankruptcy. . . . This is, in substance, the view suggested by Martin, B., but it was not adopted by the other judges of the Exchequer, and I think that it cannot be maintained. The fault of the proposition involved in this view is that it is too large. The proposition is that an action cannot be maintained because the petitioning creditor merely asks the Court to act judicially, and because it was to be assumed that the Court would decide rightly. If that proposition were well founded, it would be an answer to an action for malicious prosecution on a criminal charge, because even in that case the prosecutor merely asks the tribunal to decide upon the guilt of the person whom he charges. If a man is summoned before a justice of the peace falsely and maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, he will be put to expense in defending himself, and his fair fame may suffer from the accusation; nevertheless, the prosecutor only asks the justice to adjudicate upon the charge. Therefore it is not a good answer to an action for maliciously procuring an adjudication in bankruptcy to say, that the alleged creditor has only asked for a judicial decision. It seems to me that an action can be maintained for maliciously procuring an adjudication under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, because by the petition, which is the first process, the credit of the person against whom it is presented is injured before he can show that the action made against him is false: he is injured in his fair fame, even although he does not suffer a pecuniary loss. That seems to me to be the ground upon which Cleasby, B. supported the action in Johnson v. Emerson, and I think that his view was right.—p. 683.

CHITTY, L.J.—The point decided in Allen v. Flood is that an act lawful in itself is not converted by a malicious or bad motive into an unlawful act so as to make the doer of the act liable to a civil action. No such general question of motive arises in the present case. The sole question is whether upon the facts the case is brought within sect. 7 [of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875]. To bring a case of watching or besetting within the section it must be shown that the watching or besetting was done with a view to compel a person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing. That the watching and besetting were done with that view is found by the judge and not disputed. "View" does not import motive. It imports purpose.—p. 152.

- ELLENBOROUGH, C.J.—This nonsuit proceeded on the authority of Pope v. Foster: if that case be law the nonsuit ought to stand; if it be not, both that case and this nonsuit must fall together (p. 160). . . . The ground, therefore, on which I consider that the case of Pope v. Foster ought not to bind us, as having been decided against principle, is that this is an allegation of substance and not of description. And this distinguishes it from Green v. Bennett, which was a case of description: it described the writ in terms, when sued out, and when returnable; and the return of the writ was part of the description of the thing alleged, and could only be proved by the production of a writ so returnable. That case, therefore, was rightly decided: and so it appears to me was that of The King v. Payne, where a better opinion was delivered than in Pope v. Foster, which passed without discussion.—p. 161.

- ABBOTT, C.J. (for the Court).—The declaration in Purcell v. Macnamara, and the count on which the verdict was taken in Phillips v. Shaw (4 B. & A. 435), did not contain any such averment; and Lord Ellenborough, in the former case, intimated an opinion that if there had been such an averment [that if the plaintiff had stated the record], it might have been as descriptive of the record, and the variance would have been fatal. But, upon consideration, it appears to us that that opinion is not correct, and that the introduction of the averment in this case is wholly immaterial.—p. 5.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I quite agree with what fell from Rolfe, B. and Alderson, B. in Gosden v. Elphick, which has been referred to. There the marginal note of Flewster v. Royle being cited, that "if A. states positively to the commander of a pressgang that B. is liable to the impress service, who in truth is not so, and B., in consequence of this information, is impressed, A. is liable to an action of trespass for false imprisonment at the suit of B." Rolfe, B. said: "I must dissent from that ruling. The case may mean that the facts were evidence from which the jury might infer a wrongful imprisonment;" and Alderson, B. adds, "It would come to this, that if a constable, in search of a delinquent, says, 'Which is the man?' the persons present must not point him out; or if I see a person who is perfectly innocent taken into custody, and the guilty man running away, I must not say so, or I shall be liable in trespass." The evidence in Fleuster v. Royle very likely showed that the defendant bore some spite to the plaintiff.—p. 243.

TINDAL, C.J.—It may be observed that all the cases relied on by the plaintiff, as authority that the full costs of the former action are recoverable in a subsequent suit for vexatiously prosecuting the former action, are cases where there has been no taxation of costs in the former action; such as ejection, where the judgment was obtained by default against the casual ejector; or foreclosure, where there are no costs given in the action itself; or upon a writ of error, where no costs are given, in which cases the plaintiff must recover his full expenses, if he is entitled to recover any. But in ejection, where the action has been defended and the costs taxed, he is not entitled to recover the extra costs in a subsequent action (Doe v. Davis, 1 Esp. 358). There is only one case that has been cited in opposition to the principle above laid down, namely, that of Sandback v. Thomas; but whatever respect is due to the opinion of the very eminent judge who tried the case, we cannot think it sufficient to outweigh the authorities to which we have referred.—p. 537.

LE BLANC, J.—The ground on which that case went off was merely this, that the Court having intimated their opinion that if the case went down to trial again upon the same facts, it would be left to the jury to find for the defendant upon the ground of a presumption of a grant after twenty years' uninterrupted user of the market; the plaintiff's counsel said that if it were to be left to the jury in that manner, with the recommendation of the Court in favour of such a presumption, it would answer no purpose to go to trial again.—p. 298.

SELBORNE, L.C.—On turning to the report of The Prince's Case it certainly does appear that though there was ample evidence of usage and long judicial and public recognition of the charter granted to the prince in the eleventh year of the reign, of a kind which is not on this record as to this particular charter, yet that with regard to the form of the instrument the very learned judges who had to consider The Prince's Case were clearly of opinion that that form, prima facie at all events, was evidence of that which on the face of it was asserted—namely, the concurrence of Parliament in the grant of the Crown; and where, as in that case, public interests were concerned, and things purported to be granted which could not possibly be granted without the assent of Parliament, the effect of an Act of Parliament to all intents and purposes was ascribed to the grant.—p. 165.

LORD BLACKBURN.—If you read carefully
what Littledale, J., giving the opinion of himself and Parke, B., says, it is impossible not to perceive that they did not consider that in Prince v. Lewis the fact that the plaintiff did not maintain the market in good and sufficient order was a bar to an action such as this for disturbing the market, or even to an action against an individual for disturbance;
but only that if it was the fact that it did prevent a person from using the market, that might disprove the allegation that he had disturbed the market by selling as he did, inasmuch as he could not have sold in the market, but was prevented from doing so. That is what they pointedly say, and that I think no one would quarrel with.—p. 179.

CROMPTON, J.—If they (the above cases) are to be taken as deciding that there is no obligation on the part of the employer to continue the relation between the parties in cases like the present, or that, where there is an agreement to employ and serve for a specified time at a specified salary, an action is not maintainable against the employer immediately for a wrongful termination of the relation, but that the party discharged, instead of suing for damages immediately, must wait, and remain idle until the end of the specified period, and then sue for the salary as a sum certain, I should think that they ought not to be supported in a Court of error.—p. 647.

"There is no inflexible rule that a general hiring is a hiring for a year. Each particular case must depend on its own circumstances."]

GROVE, J. (MATHEW, J. agreeing).—As a general rule, where the hiring is a yearly hiring, it cannot be put an end to by either party before the end of the year. This rule, however, is subject to an exception in cases in which the agreement of hiring is subject to some stipulation, either express or implied by custom, enabling either party to determine the contract by notice.—p. 886.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think an agent has a right to employ, as against his principal, materials which the agent has obtained only for his principal and in the course of his agency. . . . It is said that the case of Reuter's Telegram Co. v. Byron before the late M.R., is contrary to that. I think that case goes rather too far. If that case rests upon this—namely, that the application was merely interlocutory, and the M.R. was not satisfied that the case was plain for an injunction—then it need not be questioned; but if it goes further than that, then there can, I think, be no doubt that the true principle was applied in that case more narrowly than it ought to have been.—p. 407.

MARTIN, B.—The case of Powell v. Bradbury was cited, in which it was held that a traverse, that the defendant wrongfully dismissed the plaintiff did not involve the question of wrongfulness, but merely put in issue the fact of dismissal. But it is to be observed that there is a case in this Court of Lush v. Russell, directly to the contrary. That was subsequent to the case of Powell v. Bradbury, which was then considered by this Court and overruled. In Lush v. Russell it was expressly held that on a traverse concluding to the contrary "without this, that the defendant wrongfully dismissed and discharged the plaintiff without reasonable cause," though it might be bad on special demurrer, as putting in issue an immaterial allegation, yet an issue had been taken on the plea, the plaintiff's misconduct, as well as the fact of his service, was in issue. This case, if law, is a direct authority in point.—p. 673.

WRIGHT, J.—The judgment in Willets v. Watt has caused the only difficulty that I have felt, but I think there is a clear distinction between that case and this. In that case the catchpit was left uncovered, but it was properly so left in carrying on business, and the negligence consisted not in leaving it uncovered, but in not giving warning. With regard to the expression attributed to Lord Justice Fry in the report of the case in the Law Reports, to the effect that the defect must be chronic, I observe that in the Law Journal Reports the expression attributed to him is "somewhat chronic," and I think there was enough here to satisfy the latter description.—p. 351.

WILLS, J., referring to the doctrine Volenti non fit injuria, said: But assuming its general applicability in the widest sense, it is sufficient in this case that the two judges who in Thomas v. Quartermaine formed the majority of the Court, thought that the maxim did not apply at all when the injury complained of arises from a direct breach of a statutory obligation. It is true that the Master of the Rolls expressed a contrary opinion and also that the observations of Bowen and Fry, L.JJ. were not necessary for the decision, and therefore not a binding authority on us. Yet it is a deliberate expression of opinion by two judges of the Court of Appeal in a case in which, as is well known, the judgment was long in suspense. Therefore I am disposed to follow that opinion.—p. 502.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The principles laid down in that case are, no doubt, to be accepted and followed; and, if I may say so, I entirely concur in them, but it is not in my opinion correct to regard that case as conclusive on this one. The facts there and the facts here are materially different. Under these circumstances the question is whether the plaintiff with knowledge and appreciation of both the risk and the danger, voluntarily took the risk upon himself. The plaintiff was not engaged to drive vicious horses; and the conversation with the foreman, though not evidence against the defendant of any promise by him to take the risk, is in my opinion admissible to explain the conduct of the plaintiff, and to rebut the inference that he voluntarily took the risk upon himself.—pp. 12, 13.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This Court has already in two cases—Hensey v. White and Lloyd v. Sugg & Co.—considered the meaning of the word “accident” in sect. 1 of this Act. In the former it was held that there had not, in the latter that there had, been an accident. Those cases stand one on each side of the dividing line. In Hensey v. White the workman was suffering from inherent internal weakness. He was starting the flywheel of an Otto gas engine in the ordinary course of his employment, when by reason of his internal weakness he ruptured a blood-vessel. The Court held there was no accident, for there was nothing fortuitous which intervened. . . . In Lloyd v. Sugg & Co. the injured workman was holding on an anvil a bar, the head of which had to be flattened by another workman with a hammer. The latter by a mis-hit struck the bar itself instead of the head, and thereby jarred the hand of the injured workman. There the mis-hit was unexpected and an accident. But in this case there was nothing fortuitous.—pp. 192, 193.

Bruce v. Henry (1900) 2 F. 717.—CT. OF SESS.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard & Co., the Court held that the provision as to giving notice of accidents (sect. 18) does not apply unless and until an accident has occurred "in" a factory (in the statutory sense), and that if the accident only occurred "about" a factory, that provision does not apply. . . . I entertain considerable doubt as to whether the views expressed in that case in regard to sect. 18 are correct, seeing that although the obligation to give the notice only arises when the accident happens the more natural construction would seem to me to be that the statutory requirement applies to the place throughout. I should, however, hesitate to dissent from the view expressed by a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, which has had such large experience of cases under the Act of 1897 as the C. A., by which Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard & Co. was decided, has had, unless this was necessary for the decision of the case under consideration, and I therefore prefer to rest my judgment upon the other grounds before and after stated.—p. 721.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It may be a question whether the words defining "ship-building yards" in Part Two of the Fourth Schedule to the [Factory and Workshop] Act of 1878, although expressed alternatively, do not require that the place shall be one in which ships are built, as well as finished or repaired,—in short, a ship-building yard in the proper sense. In Spencer v. Livett and others, Romer, L.J., said with regard to the definition of ship-building yard in question, that, "in his opinion, the legislature contemplated premises where the business of making, finishing and repairing ships was carried on."—p. 725.

ABBOTT, C.J.—I am aware that in Bird v. Randall Lord Mansfield is reported to have said that a former recovery need not be pleaded, but will be a bar when given in evidence. I cannot, however, accede to that, for the very first thing I learned in the study of the law was that a judgment recovered must be pleaded; that has so strongly engrafted itself on my mind as a general principle, that nothing I have heard in argument this day has shaken it. BAYLEY, J. agreed.

CHROMPTON, J.—In Blake v. Lanyon it was held by the Court of King's Bench, in accordance with the opinion of Gawdy, J. in Adams v. Bafeald, and against the opinion of the two other judges who delivered their opinions in that case, that an action will lie for continuing to employ the servant of another after notice, without having enticed him away, and although the defendant had received the servant innocently.—p. 244.

WIGHTMAN, J.—The other case was that of Taylor v. Neri, which certainly bears more directly on the present. The declaration stated that the plaintiff being manager of the Opera House had engaged Breda to sing, that the defendant beat him, whereby the plaintiff lost his service. Eyre, L.C.J., expressed a doubt whether the action was maintainable, observing that if such an action could be supported, every person whose servant whether domestic or not, was kept away a day from his business could maintain an action. He was of opinion that Breda was not a servant at all. The case was very little discussed, was a decision at nisi prius, and does not appear to have undergone much consideration; and, without adverting to some distinctions between that and the present case, it can hardly be considered as an authority of much weight for the defendant.—p. 243.

Bowen v. Hall (1881) 6 Q. B. D. 333; 50 L. J. Q. B. 305; 44 L. T. 75; 29 W. R. 367; 45 J. P. 373.—C.A.

BRETT, L.J. (for self and SELBORNE, L.C.).—The decision of the majority [in the above case] will be seen, on a careful consideration of their judgments, to have been founded upon two chains of reasoning. First, that whenever a man does an act which in law and in fact is a wrongful act, and such an act as may, as a natural and probable consequence of it; produce injury to another, and which in the particular case does produce such an injury, an action on the case will lie. This is the proposition to be deduced from the case of Ashby v. White (1 Sm. L. C. 8th ed. p. 264) (p. 337). . . . We are of opinion that the propositions deduced above from Ashby v. White are correct (p. 338). . . . Another chain of reasoning was relied on by the majority in Lumley v. Gye, and powerfully combated by Coleridge, J. It was said that the contract in question was within the principle of the Statute of Labourers. . . . We think the case is better supported upon the first and larger doctrine.—p. 339.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—Whether a servant has authority to bind his master by a warranty must depend upon the circumstances of each case. In the case of Brady v. Todd, which is relied upon to support the contention that the servant had no authority, the Court expressly reserved and excluded from their judgment a case where the circumstances were the same as those in the present case, that is to say, where stranger meets stranger at a fair.

WILLES, J. (for the Court).—The case of Lyons v. Martin was relied upon for the defendants as furnishing an appropriate illustration. There, the master was not held answerable for the act of a servant employed to impound sheep found upon his master's land, but who thought proper to impound sheep found upon a highway out of the land. If he had improperly impounded sheep found upon his master's land, the decision would have been different.—p. 420.

- FRY, J.—Those who deny that the company can be made liable rely principally on Baron Alderson's judgment in Stevens v. Midland Counties Railway Co., where he held that, in order to support such an action, it must be shown that the defendant was actuated by a motive in his mind, and that a corporation has no mind. The two other judges, Barons Platt and Martin, did not agree with Baron Alderson's reasons, but decided in the company's favour on other grounds. Has Baron Alderson's opinion, which in that case stands alone, been followed by other judges? (p. 288). [After reviewing various cases.] In Green v. London General Omnibus Co. (7 C. B. (N.S.) 290), Chief Justice Erle continues: "The doctrine relied on, that a corporation having no soul cannot be actuated by a malicious intention is more quaint than substantial." In other words, the ratio decidendi of Baron Alderson was in this case disregarded, and as his decision has not been followed in the English Courts, I am at liberty to decide in conformity with the later decisions, and I hold, therefore, that the action will lie in this case.—p. 289.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I agree that, independently of the Acts of Parliament relating to this subject, the relation between the proprietor and the driver would be that of bailor and bailee, not that of master and servant. The cab proprietor hands over the horse and cab to the charge of the driver to be used by him for the purpose of plying for hire at his own discretion, and not subject to the proprietor's control. So far I agree with the reasoning of the majority of the Court in Fowler v. Lock. But I think that the provisions of the Act of Parliament alter what would otherwise be the relation of the proprietor and the driver, and, for the protection of the public, produce the result that as regards mischief done by the driver who is selected by the proprietor, the relation of master and servant so far exists as to render the proprietor responsible for the acts of the driver.—p. 282.

GROVE, J.—Another case which has been referred to is Fowler v. Lock, but the distinction between that case and the present is manifest. It was an action brought by the cabdriver against the cab proprietor for supplying an unfit horse. Fowler v. Lock does not touch the case of an action by one of the public against the cab proprietor, and, as it has never been overruled, we must assume it to be good law. If the action in the present case had been by Lilee against Lester, by master of ship in fact against owner of ship, then Fowler v. Lock would have strongly applied.—p. 46.

 GROVE, J.—In Powles v. Hider both cab and horses belonged to the proprietor, and the cabman paid so much a day for the use of them, and this circumstance is referred to by Lord Campbell in his judgment. There is a great difference between this and the case where a man hires only the cab and provides the horses himself.—p. 106. And see judgment at length.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I cannot adopt the view of Erskine, J., in Sleath v. Wilson, that wherever a master has intrusted his servant with the control of his carriage the master is responsible for the servant's improper management of it. He is responsible when the act of the servant which causes the injury is done in the course of his employment as servant. I am far from saying that if the servant, while on his master's business, made a deviation from it for his own purpose, the master might not be liable. It would be a question of degree as to the extent of the deviation.—p. 339.

MAULE, J.—I can find no case in which a party, sitnated like these defendants are, has been held liable under circumstances like those of the present case, except the case of Matthews
v. The West London Waterworks Co., where it appears a verdict was obtained against a waterworks company for an injury resulting to the plaintiff from negligence of men employed by certain pipe-layers with whom the company had contracted for the laying down of certain water-pipes in a public street. That, however, is but a nisi prius case; the report is short and unsatisfactory, and the particular circumstances are not detailed; it certainly does, as it stands, somewhat countenance the argument which has been urged in this case. That is the only case, with the exception of Bush v. Steinman (supra), which has been considered as having laid down
 the law erroneously.—p. 872.

MELLISH, L.J.—The present case differs in two important particulars from Degg v. Midland Ry. First, in that case the plaintiff was not a mere volunteer, but was assisting in the shunting in order to get his heifer. . . . The other point of distinction is, that in Degg v. Midland Ry. the Court held that the deceased was a wrongdoer, because, although he was invited to do the act by the servants of the company, yet the knowledge and assent of the servants in that case was not the knowledge and assent of the masters.—p. 572.

BRETT, J.—The decisions in the cases of Evans v. Nicholson, and Wallace v. Allen, have been distinguished on the ground that in one case the objection was taken after, and the other before verdict, but these cases were not decided simply on that ground. In Evans v. Nicholson the judgment had been obtained on an account stated; the accounts were stated within the City, and therefore no prohibition was granted, and consequently it becomes an authority for what we are doing now. It is true it was after verdict, but what the Chief Justice meant to say when he commented on that case in Wallace v. Allen was, "In yesterday's case it is clear the matter was on accounts stated, because we have seen the judgments in the Lord Mayor's Court, and we have seen that is on the accounts stated, and on nothing more." Where, as in the case of Wallace v. Allen, it was doubtful whether what took place in the City amounted to an account stated, and if the action had been tried, and if judgment had not been suffered by default, it might have been sought to make the defendant liable for what took place outside the City, i.e., in Surrey, and therefore not merely on accounts stated within the City.—p. 456. ARCHIBALD and LINDLEY, JJ. agreed.

Bennett v. Cosgriff (1878) 38 L. T. 177.

DENMAN, J.—Evans v. Nicholson was a case in which the Court of Common Pleas held that a letter posted in the country, though it might have been held to speak when it was posted, did nevertheless also amount to a continuous statement of account at the place where it was received. Then it is argued that Taylor v. Jones is a decision the other way. It must be remembered, however, that Evans v. Nicholson was cited in that very case, and the Court intimated that they did not intend to overrule it. Nor was it necessary to do so, because they did not hold that the letter did not speak in the place where it was received, but only that it did speak in the place where it was posted. To say that the letter completed the cause of action in the place where the sender posted it is a very different thing from saying that, if a question had arisen as to the effect of the writing where it was received, the decision of the Court would have been opposed to that of Evans v. Nicholson.

LINDLEY, J.—It seems to me to have been properly decided that a letter posted in one place and received in another has a continuous effect, and speaks in the place where it is received. That view is not only consistent with Evans v. Nicholson, but was adopted and approved by the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved in Reg. v. Rogers (47 L. J. M. C. 11: 37 L. T. 473). I think the true construction of both cases is that a letter is a continuing offer, or order, or statement by the sender, which takes effect in the place where the person to whom it is sent receives it.

MELLISH, L.J.—Here the legislature says that the Court shall decide on this matter, and the Court is precluded from having cognizance of the want of jurisdiction, for there is no mode by which the want of jurisdiction can be brought before it. The necessary conclusion is, that the legislature meant that there should be no prohibition in cases within the twelfth section [of the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1867]. The only argument raised before us to the contrary was that the House of Lords, in the case of

Mayor of London v. Cox, put a different construction on the fifteenth section. The House of Lords held that in cases within that section, but not within the twelfth section, although no objection could be taken to the want of jurisdiction in the Mayor's Court except by plea, nevertheless the superior Court could issue a prohibition. But that decision is not in conflict with what we are now deciding. When the fifteenth section says that there shall be no objection except by way of plea in the Mayor's Court, it follows that by way of plea an objection to the jurisdiction may be taken. This assumes that there is a want of jurisdiction. So in cases within the fifteenth section, and not the twelfth, the very words of the Act show that there is no jurisdiction. But if there is no jurisdiction, then there must be express words taking away the right of prohibiting from the superior Court, or it will remain. It would be an anomaly that there should be an inferior Court in which there might be a plea to the jurisdiction in cases where there was no jurisdiction, and yet the superior Court shall have no right to prohibit. That decision does not apply to a case where the legislature says that in such a case no want of jurisdiction shall be objected to, either by way of plea or in any other way. That is equivalent to saying there shall be jurisdiction. By a necessary implication it follows that the prohibition is taken away.—p. 421

But, notwithstanding the respect which we all feel to be due to everything that falls from that eminent judge, I do not think that that dictum at all derogates from the authority of *Worthington v. Bridge v. Branch (1876) 1 C. P. D. 633; 34 L. T. 905.—C.P.D.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—As to the other part of the rule, I think the true answer has been given by my brother Brett in the case of Baker v. Clark, which was relied on to show that a writ of prohibition to the Mayor's Court cannot be granted upon the application of the defendant himself. That case really arose in this way. It being suggested that sect. 15 of the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857, precluded the defendant from objecting to the jurisdiction of the Court otherwise than by plea, the applicant was recommended, in order to obviate the supposed difficulty, to renew the motion in the name of a stranger. The M.R., in Jacobs v. Brett, in a deliberate judgment, clearly demonstrates that that section relates only to the procedure in the Mayor's Court. I entirely agree with that very learned judge, and so I believe do all the judges with whom I have had the opportunity of speaking on the subject.—p. 636.

Oram v. Brearey (1877) 2 Ex. D. 346; 46 L. J. Ex. 481; 36 L. T. 475; 23 W. R. 750.—EX.

POLLOCK, B.—We are pressed with [Manning v. Farquharson] on the ground that it has not been reversed, although it has been subject to an adverse decision of the M.R., and also in consequence of the mode in which it was spoken of in the considered judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Cox v. Mayor of London (supra). As to its being an authority, if that case and Jacobs v. Brett stood alone, I think we should be entitled to give preference to the latter, as, since the decision of the former case, much more light has been thrown on the subject. Then as to the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Cox v. Mayor of London, that was reversed in the House of Lords; and the opinion of Willes, J., who gave the answers to the questions put to the judges, was against the case of Manning v. Farquharson.—p. 348.

Chadwick v. Ball (1885) 14 Q. B. D. 855; 54 L. J. Q. B. 396; 52 L. T. 949.—C.A. BAGGALLAY and LINDLEY, L.JJ.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Mr. Henn Collins has called our attention to the case of Oram v. Brearey, where he had to contend to the contrary of his present contention. I have given my best attention to the treatment in that case, but I cannot concur in it. I think the argument of Mr. Henn Collins in that case ought to have prevailed, and that his present argument ought not to prevail.—p. 857.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think the decision in this case may be placed on safer ground, viz., upon the words at the end of the 7th section of the Salford Hundred Court Act. But for those words the section would have been identical with the 15th section of the Mayor's Court Act; but this section goes on to say, that "if the want of jurisdiction be not so pleaded, the Court shall have jurisdiction for all purposes." I think we must give some effect to those words beyond the effect given to the preceding words in the first part of the section. The language is peculiar; it does not say that the defendant shall not take advantage of the want of jurisdiction in arrest of judgment, or on a plea of the general issue, or otherwise: such matters are already provided for by the first part of the section. It says that the Court shall have jurisdiction for all purposes. These words seem to me entirely to meet the observations of Pollock, B., in Oram v. Brearey, where he says that the jurisdiction of the superior Court is not to be ousted except by express provision.—p. 858.

STIRLING, J., after referring to the judgment in Brandon v. Brandon, continued: The decision appears to me to rest on the ground that there had been a course of dealing between the parties which rendered it inequitable that the legal merger should be set up. In a case which has been decided since the Judicature Act came into operation, namely, Snow v. Boycott . . . a question arose as to the effect of a merger as regards lands which are stated in the report as being subject in part only to legal mortgages in fee, and it was there decided as regards the sites which were purely equitable that the question as to merger was governed by the ordinary rule in equity—namely, that of intention—and no distinction seems to have been drawn with regard to the portion as to which there was a legal merger. That is a conclusion at which in such a case one no doubt would desire to arrive, but I do not think it is necessary for me in the present case to decide that the mere expression of intention is sufficient to prevent a merger where legal interests are involved.—p. 678.

SUGDEN, L.C.—These cases then show that where there is an estate for life to A., remainder to the same person for life (as far as regards quantity of estate), the first estate for life is not merged in the second: and by parity of reason, an estate in B. for the life of A. cannot merge by the descent to B. of an estate in C. for the life of A., subsequently created, which is the case now before me. The estates are equal in quantity: for they are for the same life.—p. 710.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Speaking for myself, I should have been glad to have adopted the argument of counsel for the appellants, for I think that by the fresh building operations Colney Hatch Lane had substantially become a new street, and ought to have fallen within the decision of the Plumstead Case. But in the present case the justices have found as a fact that the lane had become a street previously to the year 1856. Upon this finding I think the street, for this purpose, was the whole street—that is to say, that both sides of Colney Hatch Lane must be taken together as forming one street, and therefore that that portion of the street which lay on the Clerkenwell side had become a street prior to 1856.—p. 11.

RUSSELL, C.J.—We have examined, but do not think it necessary to refer to the cases cited during the argument. Each case depends on its particular circumstances. It is indeed worth noting that the question of street or no street is uniformly treated in these cases as largely a question of fact. The decisions, except in Wood v. London County Council, upheld the views taken by the magistrates [viz., that the appellant had commenced to form and lay out a street within sect. 7 of the London Building Act, 1894], and, in our opinion, that case was wrongly decided.—p. 271.

BOWEN, L.J.—Supposing, then, that the Commissioners adjudicate that houses or lands "project into and obstruct or prevent them from so altering" the street, what is the effect of their adjudication? It has been urged that it is final, and that we cannot go behind it. The contrary to that was distinctly decided in Gard v. Commissioners of Sewers of City of London. In that case it was decided not merely that the adjudication, in order to be final, must be an honest and bona fide adjudication, but also that it must be an adjudication which bore some relation to reason, and that the Commissioners could not clothe themselves with jurisdiction to take a man's property by only thinking that which it was unreasonable for any sensible man to think. That was the construction placed upon the section by Lord Justice Baggallay ; the same construction was expounded by myself ; and the Lord Justice Fry, who gave a shorter judgment than Lord Justice Baggallay or myself, stated that he entirely concurred in the reasoning of the Lords Justices who had preceded him. Therefore the argument that the adjudication is necessarily final cannot be successful.

FRY, L.J.—I will only add one or two observations upon the point which the learned judge in the Court below decided, viz., that the conduct of the plaintiff precluded him from taking advantage of the present objection. The learned judge proceeded upon the authority of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, in Thomas v. Daw, with regard to the house No. 49, there mentioned. It appears to me that if this case is looked into carefully it will be seen to be no authority on the present one. The plaintiff then had full knowledge of the line upon which the Commissioners desired to proceed ; they had written to him insisting upon adhering to that line. That line was apparent to the eye of anybody who walked along the street, because the other houses had been put back to it ; and, with that knowledge, the plaintiff thought fit to make a claim in respect of the entire house. In the present case, no knowledge on the part of the plaintiff is shown ; and having regard to the letters which were written by the solicitor for the defendants, after the plan had been communicated, in which he threw doubt upon the binding nature of that plan, and asserted that the Commissioners had not made up their minds, it is extremely difficult to see how the plaintiff could be affected with any knowledge of the defendant's intentions, those intentions being kept as vague as it was possible to keep them.

WILLES, J.—It is unnecessary to enter into a discussion as to whether the view taken by three judges in this Court (St. George, Hanover Square v. Sparrow) or that taken by two judges in the Court of Queen's Bench (Bauman v. Vestry of St. Pancras) was right. It may be proper, however, to observe that in the case of the Queen's Bench, Shee, J. said that he did not think in deciding that case their judgment would necessarily conflict with the case in this Court; and he goes on to state the reason, viz., because the magistrate in Bauman v. Vestry of St. Pancras adopted the line that had been decided by the architect as the true line, which, of course, he had a right to do: the question in that case, in fact, was rather whether the architect's certificate had been given in time, than whether the magistrate was bound by it if it were so; but in the case of St. George, Hanover Square v. Sparrow, it was assumed that it made no difference when the architect gave his certificate, for one reason why the Court thought that the line fixed by the architect was not conclusive against the builder (no one doubted it was so against the architect's employers, the Metropolitan Board of Works), was the hardship of his being bound by a decision ex post facto. The cases in both Courts, therefore, are against the respondent. I may say, without any disrespect to the Court of Queen's Bench, that the opinion of the judges of this Court was misapprehended, for it is stated in Bauman v. Vestry of St. Pancras that the Court of Common Pleas had overlooked that it was the decision of the architect which gave the magistrate jurisdiction; it is quite obvious that that remark proceeds on the assumption that the judges of this Court thought that, even if the building was within the line laid down by the architect, yet if it was outside what the magistrate thought to be the true line, he could decide against the builder and order the buildings to be pulled down. No such opinion was entertained here; the judges here, equally with the judge I have quoted, thought that the magistrate had no jurisdiction except in relation to the architect's line; they thought the magistrate ought not to convict unless the building was beyond the line so laid down by the architect, but they also thought that he ought not to convict if he was of opinion that the building was not really beyond the general line of houses, though it was beyond that fixed by the architect. To that extent, therefore, the judgment in this Court appears to have been misapprehended.—p. 89.

WILLES, J.—With the utmost respect for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, as expressed in the case of Bauman v. Vestry of St. Pancras, I must say that, in my opinion, the observations made in that case do not seem at all successful in impugning the reasoning of the judges of this Court in the case of St. George, Hanover Square v. Sparrow.—p. 96.

dissenting).—The first question stated by the magistrate is, whether he is bound by the architect's certificate as conclusive, or ought to have considered for himself what the true general line of buildings was. This is a point which has been several times before the Courts prior to the decision now under appeal, and which has elicited a great diversity of opinion. In the cases of *St.
George v. Sparrow* and Wandsworth v. Hall eminent judges of the Court of Common Pleas expressed an opinion that the certificate of the architect was not binding on the justice; and in the case of Simpson v. Smith, that Court decided the question in accordance with their previously expressed opinion. But, on the other hand, in the case of Bauman v. St. Pancras, Cockburn, L.C.J. and Mellor, J. criticised the case of *St.
George v. Sparrow*, and expressed an opinion that the certificate of the architect was final and binding on the justice. In such a diversity of opinion on the point in controversy, we think that the Queen's Bench Division were right in considering that they were not precluded by authority from determining the question on its merits. We shall pursue the same course, not regardless of the views enunciated by the various judges who have expressed their opinions, but supported by remembering that, in our conclusion, whatever it may be, though we must differ from some great authorities, we must also be in accordance with others (p. 146). . . . It appears to us that there is nothing unreasonable or improbable

in the conclusion that the power of finally determining this line should be vested in the superintending architect of the Metropolitan Board.
He is, as we have already shown, an officer filling a responsible position under the Metropolitan Board; that Board is itself entrusted with large powers of superintendence over the metropolis, and over the vestries and districts. The question to be determined is one of a technical character, on which the legislature might think an architect as good a judge as a magistrate; and it may have been thought that such a reference was more likely to secure uniformity of decision than leaving the question open to each magistrate before whom it might come.—p. 148.

LINDLEY, L.J.—No far the interpretation of the statute [sect. 75 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862] is reasonably plain: but then it is said that the question still remains who is to determine whether the building complained of is in the particular street, place, or row of houses to which the architect's certificate is applicable. This is the point on which Lords Watson and Bramwell differed in Barlow v. St. Mary Abbott's Vestry. A careful perusal of Lord Herschell's judgment has led me to the conclusion that he agreed with Lord Watson, and that Lord Fitzgerald took the same view. There is much to be said for this interpretation of the Act, for, the object of the Act being to regulate lines of building, the architect, rather than the magistrate, seems naturally to be the person to say what line of building a particular house should conform to. The general line of building the architect is to decide is "such general line," and by "such" is meant the general line for the street, place, or row of houses in which the house in question is.

ESHER, M.R.—Lord Auckland's Case upon the facts differs from the present case. In that case there was an existing street, in which there was a house together with a plot of land. The house was pulled down, and the owner claimed the right to rebuild not only on the site of the old house, but also upon the adjoining plot of land. The Court of Appeal held, first, that he was entitled to rebuild upon the old site; and secondly, that the plot of land in question was part of the curtilage of the house, and was in law a part of the old house. He was not bound to build a house of the same shape upon the site of the old house, but might build both upon that site and also upon the plot of land. That is not like the present case. Here there was a house with a forecourt, and behind the house was a garden, at the end of which were some stables. It is impossible to say that that was part of the curtilage of the house. If so, the land was mere land. The statute [Metropolis Management Act, 1862, s. 75] merely provides that the owner may rebuild upon land which was occupied by the old building. This case, therefore, is not within Lord Auckland's Case,—p. 93.

CHARLES, J. (for the Court).—Now this section [119 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855] certainly imposes a restraint upon a building owner on the use of his own land, and forbids projections within specified limits, without the consent of the Metropolitan Board, beyond the general building line; and in the Islington Case the majority of the Court considered that sect. 26 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122 did no more than relieve him from this restriction so far as his own land was concerned. But it is to be observed that there is not, either in the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, or in the Amending Act, 1862, which gives authority to the architect of the Board to fix the general building line, anything to prevent that building line from being brought up to the line of the highway of the street itself, and in many instances the building line does actually adjoin the highway. In all such cases the permission granted by sect. 26 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, for projecting shop-fronts seems to carry with it, of necessity, the right to build to the extent mentioned in the section on the soil of the street itself, which belongs not to the building owner, but to the vestry or district board, and, with the sincerest respect for the judgment of the majority of the Court in the Islington Case, we think that this is the true construction of the words.—p. 177.

KEATING, J.—I find that although undoubtedly it was brought to the attention of the learned Vice-Chancellor, that he took no notice of the argument as to the want of limitation, but assumed that the section applied. But it is observable, that to a certain extent this opinion is extra-judicial, because, before the learned judge came to that part of his decision, he had in truth already decided the case, because he says: "First of all, therefore, I decide that the summons upon Mr. Rudkin, the builder, was a mere nullity going against the wrong man, because he was no longer the builder engaged in the erection of the building." Therefore he decided that the foundation of the whole proceedings was an absolute nullity, and consequently there was an end to the plaintiff's case on those proceedings. . . . Had we deemed it to be a decision upon the point raised, we should have thought ourselves bound by that decision, as being the decision of a Court of what may be termed co-ordinate jurisdiction with ourselves; but as we think it was rather assumed argumentatively than decided, we do not feel so bound.—p. 68. HONYMAN, J. agreed.

ESHER, M.R.—As to the case of Gay v. Cadby, having considered it, and having tried to understand the judgments of my brother Lindley and Mr. Justice Grove, I can only say that I cannot agree with it.—p. 40.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not, however, think that Gay v. Cadby compels the Court to say that the clinkers [which were from hotel furnaces] here must be trade refuse within sect. 128 [of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855]. The furnaces here are principally used for the same domestic purposes as ordinary grates and stoves, and are not used as in Gay v. Cadby, exclusively for wholly different purposes. I am not prepared to define trade refuse, but I can see that in many trades and manufactures clinkers might come under that description. I think Gay v. Cadby was right, but I also think that these clinkers may, consistently with that decision, be regarded as falling within that kind of stuff which the scavengers must remove without extra payment.—p. 41.

HANNEN and BLACKBURN, JJ.—In Metropolitan Board of Works v. Vauxhall Bridge, Lord Campbell intimated, for the guidance of the parties, an extra-judicial opinion of the Court (though, as he says, aware that it was not binding), that the commissioners, in making the rate, "ought not to have considered merely the value of the property of the company as in making a poor-rate, but should have been guided by the benefit which they considered that the property derived from the sewers." . . . We are not to be understood as affirming the principle laid down in the Vauxhall Bridge Case . . . or as determining that the principle of Darling v. Epsom Board is not applicable to a district within the metropolis; but we do not think it necessary in this case to decide the general question.—p. 239.

WRIGHT, J.—I can see no one clear and satisfactory authority in favour of the contention. The only one seemingly in its favour is the Vauxhall Bridge Case, to the effect that the benefit the property derived from the sewers rate should be taken into account in making the rate; but that was only the extra-judicial opinion expressed by the eminent lawyers who decided it—an opinion which, after all, did not carry the case so far as has been suggested in this case. It seems to me that whatever was said in that case was said with reference to a special Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 112); and the decision, besides containing an extra-judicial opinion, was founded on the somewhat ambiguous words of sect. 76 of that Act, which provided for "reduction or allowances in respect of sewers rate." The observations of the judges in Pew v. Metropolitan Board of Works, decided in 1865, suggest the view that the extra-judicial expression of opinion by the judges in the Vauxhall Bridge Case did not express the law. One of the same judges (Blackburn, J.), who in 1865 intimated his doubt as to the Vauxhall Bridge Case, laid down the law—whiter, it is true—in Griffiths v. Longdon and Eversfield Drainage Board, that the true rule is that only those who derive benefit within the district in which the works are executed are to be rated, and rated to an equal rate. I therefore come to the conclusion on the authorities, particularly with regard to Reg. v. Head, that the rate must be an equal rate upon all property in the district benefited by the works of improvement.—p. 434.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The cases do not seem to me to embarrass us. The only case which might at first be thought to do so is Northbrook v. Plumstead Board of Works, in which the circumstances were very different, but expressions fell from the Court which are, perhaps, capable of being pressed to the length Mr. Barrow pressed them, but which the case itself does not warrant. There Lord Northbrook had preserved the property in a private road. There had been no dedication to the public which would be past recall, and on that ground (from which I am not prepared to differ) the Court held Lord Northbrook liable to contribute.—p. 44.

ESHER, M.R.—Therefore the question is whether, under such circumstances, this chapel is brought into the same category as a church or a building which is dealt with by Act of Parliament, and it seems to me that it certainly is not. That makes the whole difference, and this appears to have been the view of Lord Mansfield in Robson v. Hyde. He said (p. 314): "It is said, indeed, that he is restrained from doing this by covenant, but the restriction by covenant does not vary the nature of the property." The common law of England has varied the nature of the property in the case of buildings which are by statute put into the same position as a church as to the possibility of letting them. These covenants are no more than agreements between the parties for breach of which some remedy will be given at law. They do not vary the nature of the property, because they may at any moment be put an end to by the consent of the parties interested. I agree with the decision of Lord Mansfield, and, therefore, I hold that this chapel is within the subject-matter dealt with by these Acts, and that the trustees are such owners as are liable to contribute to these expenses. In my opinion, therefore, the decision of the Divisional Court is right, and must be affirmed. In coming to this conclusion I think we shall not be overruling any previous decision. We do not overrule Angell v. Vestry of Paddington; that decision remains untouched, and so, I think, does Bowditch v. Wakefield Board of Health. Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney Board of Works, whatever may be the meaning of the judgment of the House of Lords, which I do not at present fully comprehend, cannot have anything to do with the present case. If we had decided otherwise we should have been overruling Caiger v. Vestry of St. Mary, Islington. We do not interfere in any way with Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Co. We do not overrule any previous decision, but we give a wider interpretation to the word "house" than has been suggested by several learned judges, certainly by Lord Coleridge.—p. 394.

North v. Walthamstow Urban Council (1898) 67 L. J. Q. B. 972; 62 J. P. 836.—CHANNELL, J. CHANNELL, J.—I think that notwithstanding the difference between the two cases, Andrew v. St. Olave's B. W. really proceeds upon a principle which is applicable to the present case. . . . I am satisfied from what counsel for the present defendants, who was in the case, tells me, that Self v. Hove Commissioners (ante, col. 1630, seq.) was before the Court when Andrew's Case was decided . . . and that it must be treated as having been held by the Court not to be so much in point as the other case of Gebhardt v. Saunders ([1892] 2 Q. B. 452) which they professed to follow. I am strengthened in this view by the fact that Self v. Hove Commissioners is not, in my opinion, an entirely satisfactory case. . . . Mr. Justice Wills . . . went on to say that in his opinion it was not the defendants' duty to do the work at all, and of course, if that were so, the other point, which is the point in this case, would not arise. . . . Accordingly, we are brought back to the question, what is the true principle of Andrew's Case and of Gebhardt v. Saunders which pre-cooled it? . . . I find that both in Gebhardt v. Saunders and in Andrew's Case attention is drawn to the necessity of the party acting at once; and I think that the point of that observation is to be found in this—that where there is such a necessity, less must be considered to amount to such compulsion as to prevent a man being a mere volunteer than would be considered so to do in other cases. . . . The question, therefore, to my mind, is what degree of compulsion, if I may say so, is necessary to make that principle applicable? . . . I do not think that the compulsion need be, if I may so express it, irresistible. . . . If a person or body of persons either commences or threatens to commence proceedings against any-one, and he submits, he is no longer a mere volunteer. . . . That it need not be actual legal compulsion is, I think, fairly clear.—pp. 973—976.

KAY, L.J.—I quite agree that the case of Reg. v. Marsham decided that when these expenses had been apportioned, and the Local Board were seeking to recover a proportionate part for the work which had been done by them, they would be bound to show that the repairs had been done, and certain moneys had been expended in those repairs; and, having shown that, it seems to me that the decision in Reg. v. Marsham is satisfied. That case does not go on to decide, and it is not necessary for the decision of that case to hold that the word "necessary" in this Act [the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1890], which I have just referred to is also a matter which is to be brought for the decision of a magistrate, when payment of the apportioned part is sought to be enforced.

BLACKBURN, J.—It is contended for the appellant that sect. 53 (of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) applies to new as well as old streets; and that the proviso as to streets in which sewer rates have been levied for five years prior to the 1st of January, 1856, exempts the appellant's land from liability to contribute to the expense of constructing the sewer; and that the case of St. Giles' Vestry, Camberwell v. Weller is in his favour, in which the Court of Exchequer decided that the expense of constructing a sewer in a new street where sewer rates had been paid, was to be divided between the adjoining landowners and the rest of the parish. And it must be admitted that if that case were right, inasmuch as sewer rates were levied on the appellant's land more than five years before the 1st January, 1856, it would be exempt from liability by the proviso.—p. 170. [His lordship then discussed the effect of such a construction, and decided, against St. Giles' Vestry, Camberwell v. Weller, that sect. 53 applies "to streets which are not new but old, having either no sewer or only an open sewer."]

LINDLEY, L.J.—The vestry are required by sect. 125 [of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855] either to employ a sufficient number of persons to remove dust, or to contract with other persons for its removal. Here the defendants have performed their statutory duty by entering into a contract, and it then becomes the duty of the contractor to do the work. Of course the board could not discharge that duty by entering into an illusory contract: but nothing of that kind is alleged in the present case. In my opinion . . . the board have discharged their statutory duty. . . . It is said that this view of sect. 125 is inconsistent with the judgments of Mellor and Lush, JJ., in The Guardians of the Holborn Union v. The Vestry of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch. There are, no doubt, some passages in those judgments which at first sight appear to be in favour of the plaintiff, but when the facts of that case are looked at, it is plain that it has no application to the present case.—p. 308.

JESSEL, M.R.—Now this very section, the 89th, was read by the learned L.J. (James, L.J., when V.-C.), as empowering the Court to order so much of the expenses of all purchases made in pursuance of the Act as it should deem reasonable to be paid by the "other persons" therein mentioned, including a vestry, and thereupon he ordered the vestry to pay the costs of a petition for the payment out of Court of purchase-money paid in by them. The section, however, says nothing about the costs of payment out, and I am afraid the L.J.'s sense of what ought to have been inserted in the Act led him to treat it as if it had been inserted. I cannot think he meant that as the Act rendered the vestry liable to pay the costs of purchases, therefore they were liable to pay the costs of a petition for payment out. There must have been some other reason; possibly the L. J. felt himself bound by a sense of abstract justice to take the view he did. But in Vicar and Churchwardens of St. Sepulchre's, Ex parte (33 L. J. Ch. 372), Lord Westbury decided this very point the other way, and Straehan's Estate, In re (9 Hare, 185), before Turner, V.-C., is another case which has a strong bearing upon it. Though I see James, L.J., was counsel in the latter case, he does not seem to have remembered it when Saunders' Estate, In re, came before him, and neither of those two cases was cited to him. I cannot, therefore, consider Saunders' Estate, In re, as a binding decision.—p. 187.

KEKEWICH, J.—What the petitioner's counsel has called the dictum of Lord Selborne in Elias v. Snowdon Slate Quarries Co., but which, I think, is more than a dictum, gives us in a few sentences what is the settled law on the subject. What he says is this: "When a mine or quarry is once open, so that the owner of an estate impeachable for waste may work it, I do not consider that the sinking of a new pit on the same vein, or breaking ground in a new place on the same rock, is necessarily the opening of a new mine or a new quarry." . . . But it is obvious that you must not construe that without any limitation whatever. Where a settler, the owner of an estate in one county, in which there is a seam of coal, is also owner of another estate in an adjoining county where the same seam of coal is found, and has only worked the seam under one estate, Lord Selborne's words cannot mean that the working of the mine and opening a pit on the estate in an adjoining county is not an opening of a new mine. I do not think it would be right to wrest his language to make it fit such an extreme case as that. And I am justified in making that limitation because Lord Selborne, though he laid down the law thus clearly, says this immediately afterwards: "And for this, authority is to be found in the cases, which were cited at the bar, of Clavering v. Clavering, Bagot v. Bagot, and Cowley (Earl) v. Wellesley. . . I do not think it necessary to refer to Bagot v. Bagot further. We have the judgment of King, L.C., in Clavering v. Clavering, which contains a curious expression relative to a practice in the county of Devonshire, that "any person having a right to dig in mines may pursue the mine, and open new shafts or pits to follow the same vein." The point which was before the L.C.'s mind, which he brings out in a very clear manner, was that in reality you are pursuing the same mine, or the same seam. It is a "pursuing" by means not of boring to one level under one particular mine, but by sinking a new pit so as to work the minerals in connection with the shaft under the old pit. That is what he means by pursuing the same vein, notwithstanding that it is reached in a different way. That is exactly what is said, with reference to a very different subject, in Cowley (Earl) v. Wellesley. There it was a case of waste land, under which was gravel and no coal, and the gravel was reached by pits dug upon the surface, each pit being separate. The gravel had been taken there for some time, and the question was whether each new gravel pit was a new working, or only a continuation of the old working, and Lord Romilly said that "The whole of the gravel or sand on the waste land must be treated as a mine, and each gravel pit as if it were a fresh pit in the mine"—that is to say, he treats the waste of the manor and the gravel or sand under it as one mine. The lord of the manor digs a pit here and there all over the waste; on each occasion he is what King, L.C. calls "pursuing the vein"; he does not pursue it in the sense of working it out inch by inch through the soil by continuing along the line or vein, but by attacking the vein at another place. He is still working the vein in the waste land. Now, I fail to see how you can apply that to this case.—p. 610.

FRY, J.—In the first place it appears that such a clause is not uncommon in Scotland, and the observations of one of the noble lords in Gowan v. Christie (supra) were referred to. But the practice in Scotland and in England is very different in many respects in regard to dealings in landed property and mines, and it is impossible for me to hold the one practice to be a precedent for the other, or an authority binding on me. The other argument was derived from the observations of the M.R. in Abinger (Lord) v. Ashton. But he was there dealing with the proper construction to be put upon a covenant to work mines, and he pointed out that an unreasonable construction had been contended for, which might require the lessee to work at a continuous and regular loss. The difference between that and the present argument is very plain. There the M.R. was only showing that, during the continuance of the lease, the lessee might not be under any obligation to do more than pay the dead rent; he might be under no additional obligation to work at an actual loss. Here the contention is that the lessee, if he cannot work at a profit, has a right to escape from the payment of the dead rent which is reserved during the term.—p. 118.

WILLES, J.—It remains only to deal with Bute (Marquis) v. Thompson. There, by the express terms of the contract, the lessee covenanted absolutely to raise a given quantity of coal in each year, or to pay a minimum rent which should represent the minimum amount of coal agreed to be worked; and the lessee failing to raise the stipulated quantity of coal, he was held bound at all events to pay the minimum rent. . . . The judgment, however, must be read with reference to the subject-matter with which the Court was dealing; and, so reading it, it is plain that the Court construed the covenant, not as a stipulation exhausting itself upon the first breach as to the raising of the coal, but as an alternative covenant to secure the lessor at all events a minimum rent during the term, whether or not coal was worked or was there to be worked. There, is, however, no such covenant here.—p. 587.

CLEASBY, B.—In Dugdale v. Robertson (supra), in which the minerals had been leased at certain rents and royalties, with a provision that they should not be taken from underneath certain specified places, the V.-C. (Wood) was of opinion that in a lease of that description there was a presumption that the right to support was reserved unless it appeared distinctly by express words upon the instrument that it was intended to be given up. Upon that case, it may be observed, as distinguishing it from the present, that the demise there was of all the minerals of any description under the land and not of one seam of coal called the High Hazle Bed, as in the present case, and further, that it does not appear what the reservation of rent was, whether of an acreage rent or in any other form. We may assume, however, that there was not a minimum rent as for two acres got, or so important a feature would not be omitted from the report of the case and of the judgment. . . . But this decision appears to us to be qualified by the subsequent cases of Shafto v. Johnson, decided by the same learned judge (of which there is a full report in 8 Best & Smith, p. 252), and Taylor v. Shafto. Both these cases involved the same question, viz., whether lessees of coal mines under a certain lease who had so worked the mines as to let down the surface, had committed an actionable wrong, in which case the mining lease would not have been an incumbrance to the title to the surface afterwards conveyed, or had only done acts which the lease authorised them to do, in which case the lease would have been an incumbrance. In Shafto v. Johnson Wood, V.-C. came to a different conclusion from that which he had arrived at in Dugdale v. Robertson, and though there were no words distinctly reserving the right to support, he held in effect that the lessees were not responsible for the subsidence caused by getting the minerals. . . . In the subsequent part of the same judgment . . . the learned judge refers to the case of Dugdale v. Robertson, as one which went to the full extent of the authorities, and in which the case was put as strongly as it well could be against the view which he was entertaining in the case under consideration. No doubt Dugdale v. Robertson is not disapproved of, but it does appear to us, that the principle of the two decisions is not the same, and that the correct view is that taken at the beginning of the judgment in Shafto v. Johnson which we have given above. The judgment in the Ex. Ch., in Taylor v. Shafto, agrees with that of the V.-C. in making the terms of the lease decisive as to the extent to which the lessees were justified in going in working the mines.—p. 44.

Davis v. Treharne (1881) 6 App. Cas. 460; 50 L. J. Q. B. 665; 29 W. R. 869.—H.L. (E.). LORD BLACKBURN.—When I come to look at the documents, though one is more ready, it being a lease, to believe that the parties meant to say, You shall take all the minerals letting down the surface, than one would have been if it was a sale or reservation of minerals below to be taken out at some future time, I cannot agree with what seems to have been said (I do not know whether that was what was meant) by Cleasby, B., in Eadon v. Jeffcock (supra). I cannot agree that it follows from that that there is not a right of support. I think the right of support exists unless it is taken away. I think the fact that it is a lease may be one of the elements to be taken into consideration in seeing whether it is taken away or not, but that it is not enough of itself to decide the question.—p. 467.

LORD WATSON.—When a proprietor of the surface and the subjacent strata grants a lease of the whole or part of his minerals to a tenant, I think it is an implied term of that contract that support shall be given in the course of working to the surface of the land. If it is not intended that that right should be reserved, the parties must make it very clear upon the face of their contract; in other words they must express their intention so clearly as to enable a Court to say that such intention is plain. I think that rule was laid down by the late Mellish, L.J. in Hext v. Gill, and I quite agree with that ruling. It may be done in express terms; but of course it is not necessary that express language must be used; for it may appear by a plain implication from other clauses of the deed, as in Taylor v. Shafto (supra), where an obligation was laid upon the tenant to perform certain acts which were plainly inconsistent with supporting the surface.—p. 469.

BYRNE, J.—Without dealing with the circumstances of that case [Hext v. Gill], I refer at once to a passage in the judgment where Mellish, L.J. says that “the result of the authorities, without going through them, appears to be this: that a reservation of ‘minerals’ includes every substance which can be got from underneath the surface of the earth for the purpose of profit, unless there is something in the context or in the nature of the transaction to induce the Court to give it a more limited meaning.” . . . In Glasgow (Lord Provost) v. Farie a question arose as to the meaning, within the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, of a reservation of the whole coal and other minerals in the land, and there was some discussion as to the true effect of Hext v. Gill. Lord Halsbury says: "I cannot help thinking that the true test of what are mines and minerals in a grant was suggested by James, L.J. in Hext v. Gill . . . and although the L.J. held himself bound by authority so that he yielded to the technical sense which had been attributed to those words, I still think (to use his language) that a grant of 'mines and minerals' is a question of fact 'what these words meant in the vernacular of the mining world, the commercial world, and landowners,' at the time when they were used in the instrument." . . . Now the observations of the noble lords in Glasgow (Lord Provost) v. Farie were very much considered in Jersey (Earl) v. Neath Union. . . . In reference to the criticism of the L.C. in Glasgow (Lord Provost) v. Farie, Bowen, L.J. observes: "I would only say, with regard to Lord Halsbury's criticisms on Hext v. Gill, I cannot help thinking either that he has not been perfectly reported, or else the L.C. had not in his mind at the moment the exact canon of construction of Mellish, L.J., because Mellish, L.J. does not say, nor, I think, mean, that the test was whether the minerals could be worked at a market profit at the time, but whether they had a use and a value of their own independent of and separable from the rest of the soil." Reading the passage from Mellish, L.J.'s judgment, to which I have referred, together with what Bowen, L.J. says in the passage I last read, it does not appear to me that, as interpreted by Bowen, L.J., there is anything in the law as laid down in Hext v. Gill open to the criticism before mentioned. Jersey (Earl) v. Neath Union is a clear decision, if it were wanted, that Hext v. Gill is a binding authority, not only upon me, but also in the C.A. Now the question is, what is the true rule in Hext v. Gill? . . . I understand the true rule to be this: You inquire what the substances are; then you see whether they are minerals, in the sense that they belong to a class of substances, or form a class or kind of substance of which it can be said that that substance is a valuable article, either for the purpose of sale or for other purposes. —p. 561.

HALSBURY, L.C.—With respect to the authorities, Nicklin v. Williams (supra) was urged by the Att.-Gen. as an authority upon the question now before your lordships, by reason of some words attributed to Lord Westbury in Bonomi v. Backhouse. If Lord Westbury really did use the words attributed to him, it is, I think, open to doubt in what sense they are to be understood. Parke, B. in that case delivered the judgment against the plaintiffs recovering any subsequently accruing damage, because, he said, the cause of action was the original injury to the right by withdrawing support. That principle is admittedly wrong, and was expressly held to be wrong in Bonomi v. Backhouse, since if that had been law there could have been no answer to the plea of the Statute of Limitations in that case. It is difficult to follow the M.R. when he says it was not necessary to overrule Nicklin v. Williams by that decision. It seems to me to have been the whole point decided in Nicklin v. Williams, and how that case so decided can be an authority for anything I am at a loss to understand. I think the decision of this case must depend as matter of logic upon the decision of your lordships' House in Bonomi v. Backhouse, and I do not know that it is a very legitimate inquiry, when a principle has been laid down by a tribunal from which there is no appeal, and which is bound by its own decisions, whether that principle is upon the whole advantageous or convenient; but if such considerations were permissible, I think Cockburn, C.J., in his judgment in Lamb v. Walker, established the balance of convenience to be on the side of the law, as established by Bonomi v. Backhouse. I cannot logically distinguish between a first and a second, or a third, or more subsidences, and after Bonomi v. Backhouse it is impossible to say that it was wrong in any sense for the defendant to remove the coal. Cresswell, J. has said, and I think rightly, that he might remove every atom of the mineral. The wrong consists, and, as it appears to me, wholly consists in causing another man damage, and I think he may recover for that damage as and when it occurs.—p. 134.

LORD FITZGERALD.—My lords, the real, though not the formal question for your lordships' determination is, whether Lamb v. Walker was correctly decided. . . . I think that we may deduce from the authorities some propositions as now settled in law, and applicable to the circumstances of the appeal now before your lordships' House, and to similar cases:—I proceed to state those propositions, though in doing so I am conscious of the danger pointed out by my noble and learned friend, Lord Bramwell [viz., that in laying down general propositions some necessary qualification or exception is generally omitted, and that such propositions are generally called "obiter"]. (1) That the owner of the surface has a natural and legal right to the undisturbed enjoyment of that surface in the absence of any binding agreement to the contrary. (2) That the owner of the subjacent minerals may excavate and remove them to the utmost extent, but should exercise that right so as not to disturb the lawful enjoyment of the owner of the surface. (3) That the excavation and removal of the minerals does not, per se, constitute any actionable invasion of the right of the owner of the surface, although subsequent events show that no adequate supports have been left to sustain the surface. (4) But that, when in consequence of not leaving or providing sufficient supports, a disturbance of the surface takes place, that disturbance is an invasion of the right of the owner of the surface, and constitutes his cause of action (p. 148). . . . I am of opinion that Cockburn, C.J., in Lamb v. Walker, and the C. A. in the case before us, were respectively right in resting on Backhouse v. Bonomi, and deducing from it a principle which governs the question. Backhouse v. Bonomi is not satisfactorily reported. We gather from the report in your lordships' House with some difficulty what was actually decided. Mr. Manisty, in his argument in that case at your lordships' bar, puts it thus:—"The act done was a perfectly innocent act at the time it was done; the argument on the other side is that it must be treated as having been injurious, because it might afterwards become so. If the action had been brought when the act was first done, the answer would have been that the defendant had a right to do the act, and that no damage had been occasioned." Lord Westbury says, "I think it is abundantly clear, both on principle and authority, that when the enjoyment of the house is interfered with by the actual occurrence of the mischief, the cause of action then arises, and the action may then be maintained." And Lord Cranworth adds:—"It has been supposed that the right of the party whose land is interfered with is a right to what is called the pillars or the support. In truth, his right is to the ordinary enjoyment of his land, and until that ordinary enjoyment is interfered with he has nothing of which to complain. That seems the principle on which the case ought to be disposed of." It seems to me that Backhouse v. Bonomi did decide that the removal of the subjacent strata was an act (I will not say an innocent act) done in the legitimate exercise of ordinary ownership, which, per se, gave no right of action to the owner of the surface, and that the latter had no right of action until his enjoyment of the surface was actually disturbed. The disturbance then constituted his right of action. There was a complete cause of action in 1868, in respect of which compensation was given, but there was a liability to further disturbance. The defendants permitted the state of things to continue without taking any steps to prevent the occurrence of any future injury. A fresh subsidence took place, causing a new and further disturbance of the plaintiff's enjoyment, which gave him a new and distinct cause of action. . . . The necessary conclusion is that Lamb v. Walker is not correctly decided, and that the able reasoning of Cockburn, C.J. in that case ought to have prevailed.—p. 150. And see col. 1809.

ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that the law applicable to this case has been laid down by the H. L. in Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell. It is contended on behalf of the defendants that that case is distinguishable, the distinction relied upon by Mr. Walton being, that there the subsidence occurred by fits and starts, as he puts it, whereas here the subsidence was continuous—it went on without stopping . . . assuming it to be so, still, inasmuch as no cause of action accrues until damage has been done, when only a certain amount of damage has been done there is only a cause of action to that amount; but when the damage goes on—when it becomes more, though of the same kind—that additional damage is another and a different damage. There is no cause of action in respect of that additional damage until that damage has occurred, and the H. L. has in Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell, laid down that there is a new cause of action for each successive damage.—p. 894.

LORD BLACKBURN.—Now, my lords, there was a technical rule in the English Courts in these matters. When something that was part of the realty (we are talking of coal in this particular case) is severed from the realty and converted into a chattel, then instantly on its becoming a chattel, it becomes the property of the person who had been the owner of the fee in the land whilst it remained a portion of the land; and then in estimating the damages against a person who had carried away that chattel, it was considered and decided that the owner of the fee was to be paid the value of the chattel at the time when it was converted, and it would in fact have been improper, as qualifying his own wrong, to allow the wrongdoer anything for that mischief which he had done, or for that expense which he had incurred in converting the piece of rock into a chattel, which he had no business to do. Such was the rule of the common law. Whether or not that was a judicious rule at any time I do not take upon myself to say; but a long while ago (and when I say a long while I mean twenty-five years ago), Parke, B. put this qualification on it, as far as I am aware, for the first time. He said, If however the wrongdoer has taken it perfectly innocently and ignorantly, without any negligence and so forth, and if the jury, in estimating the damages, are convinced of that, then you should consider the mischief that has really been done to the plaintiff who lost it whilst it was part of the rock, and therefore you should not consider its value when it had been turned into a piece of coal after it had been severed from the rock, but you should treat it at what would have been a fair price if the wrongdoer had bought it whilst it was yet a portion of the land, as you would buy a coalfield [Wood v. Morewood (supra)]. That was the rule to be applied where it was an innocent person that did the wrong; that rule was followed in Jegon v. Vivian, which has been so much mentioned; it was followed in the Court of Chancery, and, so far as I know, it has never been questioned since, that where there is an innocent wrong-doing the point that is to be made out for the damages is, as was expressed in the minutes of the decree:—"The defendants to be charged with the fair value of such coal and other minerals at the same rate as if the mines had been purchased by the defendants at the fair market value of the district;" that I understand to mean as if the mines had been purchased while the minerals were yet part of the soil.—p. 39.

COTTON, L.J.—That was a Scotch case, and it was a very peculiar one, because there the party claiming damages for the wrongful taking of the minerals was the owner of a little bit of coal, which by itself could never have been worked, being situated in the midst of other mines and quite surrounded by them, having no shaft in it. Therefore it could not be worked, and the owner was in this position, that if his neighbour had not taken it, he never could have got for that coal, or for a licence to work that coal, more than the House of Lords gave him, which was not the value of the coal when severed from the mine, but only the royalty which his own witnesses said he could have got for the coal. That was entirely different from this. Here there was a shaft down to the coal, and because the coal was all worked out there was nothing to prevent the pillars being taken, and the coal claimed by the landlord, which pillars the lessees were expressly prohibited from taking.—p. 897.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD.—It is very difficult to follow the reasoning of the learned V.-C. [Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. N. E. Ry.]. His honour said distinctly "there was no improper intention." He held that what was done "was done under a mistake." Yet the defendants were visited with all the pains and penalties of fraud. The account was carried back beyond the six years; the measure of damages was in accordance with the severest rule ever applied. The ground of the decision seems to have been that although there was no moral fraud—no fraud in fact—yet "for the purposes of the statute the breaking of bounds into a neighbour's colliery must be considered a fraudulent act." There is no foundation for that proposition. . . . In all or almost all the other cases cited at the bar the Court held that fraud was not established. But Sir J. Romilly, in Dean v. Thwaite, and Fry, J., in Trotter v. Maclean, expressed their opinion that fraud would or might be an answer to the plea of the statute. In Dean v. Thwaite, where the learned M.R. held that the evidence of fraud was not conclusive, his honour made these observations: "The case of fraud alleged, and the only fraud that I think would justify the Court in coming to the conclusion that the coal gotten before that period"—that is, before the period of limitation—"ought to be accounted for, is that the defendant had intentionally taken the plaintiff's cost, and had concealed the fact, and during the process had taken steps to prevent the plaintiff discovering it." If those observations are to be construed to mean that in his honour's opinion something more was required beyond taking the coal furtively, their lordships are unable to agree in them. But they think that is not the fair meaning of the passage cited, which must be understood as applied to the alleged facts of the case on which his honour was then commenting. . . . It may be observed that in Trotter v. Maclean no fraud was suggested beyond the fraud that lies in the secrecy of wilful trespass underground, and that the plaintiffs failed to prove in that case that the trespass was wilful.—p. 33.

HATSBURY, L.C.—Dudley Canal Co. v. Grazebrook (supra) may have been quite right, and I should be very loth to say it was wrong; but the statute there seems to me to be distinguishable in such important respects from the statute now under consideration that I am unable to derive the least assistance from the decision in that case. The scheme and structure of the Acts are entirely different. Here the plain words of the 37th section make the mine-owner liable if he causes injury to the canal. . . . I agree with Fry, L.J., that sect. 38 gives rights and remedies to a larger class of persons than the mine-owners who are mentioned in sect. 37. The section seems to me to contemplate the case of the mine-owner who is hindered by the existence of the canal from the further prosecution of his mining enterprise. It appears to me, therefore, I confess, without any doubt or hesitation, that the supposed injustice of construing the language in its natural and ordinary sense does not arise. But when I find the high authority of Lord Cottenham in favour of construing these words as I construe them, and that in no uncertain terms, in a decision which has now for many years been an unquestioned authority upon the subject (Cromford Canal Co. v. Cutts), I certainly can feel no difficulty whatever in moving your lordships that the judgment of the C. A. be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.—p. 42.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The main question to be determined is the effect of sects. 39 and 40 of the Act of 1794. Precisely similar sections in another Canal Act came under the consideration of this House in Knowles v. Lancashire, &c., Ry. . . . It appears clear that sect. 39 has no application to this coal, that section being in terms confined to the subjacent minerals. As regards these there is a clear statutory prohibition of any such working of them as will injure or prejudice the canal or towing-path, and there is therefore a statutory liability imposed if these minerals are so worked as prejudicially to affect the canal or any of the accompanying works belonging to the proprietors. As regards the working of minerals adjacent to the canal there is no corresponding prohibition or liability. In Knowles v. Lancashire, &c., Ry. the plaintiffs' claim was for working coal under and near the canal and works, whereby they had been injured. . . . In the argument on behalf of the defendants [in that case] in this House, no distinction was drawn between subjacent and adjacent coal. It may probably have been the case that if the subjacent coal had been left, the working of the adjacent coal would have caused no subsidence. But, however that may be, the judgment of this House was rested entirely upon the express provisions of sect. 37 in the Act then under consideration, which corresponds with sect. 39 of the statute of 1794. The L.C. pointed out that the plain words of the 37th section made the mine-owner liable if he caused injury to the canal, and that no reason for cutting down the plain meaning of the words could be derived from the enactment contained in the succeeding section. Lord Macnaghten took the same view. . . . It is to be observed that in the opinion of the noble and learned lord, sects. 37 and 38 (in this Act sects. 39 and 40) were to be read together, and that his judgment as to the liability of the mine-owner, and the right which he has to insist that the amount of compensation payable to him for the coal necessary for the support of the canal should be ascertained, is based on the statutory liability created by the earlier section. In a case, therefore, like the present, in which sect. 39 is inapplicable, and where there is no statutory liability in relation to the working of the coal, the entire reasoning of this House in Knowles v. Lancashire, &c., Ry. is equally inapplicable. What I have said with reference to Knowles's Case applies also to . . . Cromford Canal Co. v. Cutts.—pp. 648—651.

ROMER, L.J.—Those cases dealt with two special Acts of Parliament which were almost identical in terms. The cases turned entirely upon the very special wording of those Acts, and all that they decided was this: They were Acts dealing with Canal Companies who had power to acquire property for the purpose of a canal. The Acts showed that, owing to their special terms, compensation for any difficulties placed in the way of a mine owner in working his minerals under or near the canal, were to be compensated for at the time when the working of the mine owner came so near to the canal as to be likely to damage it. On the true construction of the Acts, one of the difficulties in question, entitling the coal owner to compensation, was his being obliged, for fear of injury to the canal, not to continue his workings. It is with regard to those Acts that the L.J., in the report of Knowles v. Lancashire, &c., Ry., observed, first, that no general principle was involved in the determination of the case; and, secondly, that the decision of the case in no way affected the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, or, indeed, any other statute not enacted in the same terms.—p. 58.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The actual decision in that case [N. E. Ry. v. Crosland] is to me clear; for it was that, where a landowner has conveyed to a railway company "the right and privilege of making, and for ever hereafter maintaining," a tunnel through his land, he could not afterwards call upon the railway company to compensate him for the minerals when he desired to work them within forty yards of the line, because he had sold the right to support to the tunnel to the railway company, and consequently could not make the company again pay for the minerals. It will be seen at p. 357 of the report of the case in the Law Journal Reports, that the bill was framed upon this hypothesis, and upon this alone, by the company against the landowner, by which bill the company sought to restrain the landowner from winning minerals within forty yards of the line, which he threatened to do unless the company paid him for them, and the company were successful. Knight Bruce, L.J., gave judgment against the landowner, solely upon the ground upon which the bill was framed. Turner, L.J. dealt with the statutes which existed in that case; but I must point out that, although some parts of the Acts therein referred to were similar to those in the present case, when taken as a whole, the legislation in that case does not appear to me to cover this case.—p. 694.

SELBORNE, L.C.—My lords, the Second Division of the Court of Session in this case have held that the railway company is not placed by the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, in the position of having thirty days after the receipt of a notice from a mine-owner and no more, within which to make up their minds whether they will give a counter-notice to prevent the working of the minerals under the railway and for a certain distance from it upon the terms of compensation provided by the Act. There appears to be no authority upon this subject, unless it be a dictum which incidentally fell from the late L.C. in this House in Smith v. G. W. Ry. Undoubtedly, the L.C. did in that case, in which no counter-notice had been given, and when the question did really not arise, and was in no way material to the decision, say this: "There is no doubt that when Mr. Smith gave his notice to the directors of his intention to work, he stated to them that he intended to work both coal and ironstone, and if that notice was to be held a good notice entitling him to work as to the ironstone, the time has passed for the railway directors to give a counter-notice, and he would be entitled, whether they were willing to compensate him or not, now to work the ironstone." Your lordships will, I am sure, feel great respect for any dictum, even when unnecessary for the purpose of the decision of the particular case with reference to which it was said, which fell from so eminent a judge. . . . At the most it indicates the prima facie impression of a very eminent and learned judge which certainly, so far as it goes, is favourable to the argument of the appellants in this case.—p. 826.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—Now without considering the present authority of the above case, a certain dictum occurs in that case which has been entirely set aside by a subsequent case in the H. L., namely, Rowbotham v. Wilson (supra, col. 1810) the dictum that if a deed could be produced containing such a grant as was then necessary to be presumed, in order for the defendant to establish his case, the deed itself would not be considered reasonable, because such a deed would be inconsistent with the right granted. That dictum has been entirely overthrown, and as far as regards the case before us there is nothing unreasonable in the construction that is put upon the Act of Parliament.—p. 451. LORDS CHELMSFORD and COLONSAY to the same effect.

LUSH, J.—If I could see that the attention of the Court had been directed in Blackett v. Bradley to the distinction between that case and Hilton v. Granville (Earl), and to the provisions of the Inclosure Act, I should feel myself bound to follow the decision in that case. But it is clear that the Court proceeded on the admission that the decision in Hilton v. Granville (Earl) did govern the case, and, moreover, the attention of the Court does not seem to have been called to the effect of the words of the Inclosure Act expressly giving the lord the right to let down the surface without making compensation. It appears to me that, whether well founded originally or not, this right is expressly legalized by the Act. The allottees take their allotments subject to the conditions imposed by the Act, and among them to the condition that the lord of the manor may work the mines without leaving sufficient support, and without making compensation. Furthermore, the Act expressly provides for compensation from a different source, namely, from contributions to be levied upon the other allotments in the same township. Under these circumstances I do not feel myself bound by Blackett v. Bradley.—p. 161.

SELBORNE, L.C.—No authority whatever was cited in support of the appellant's argument except the case of Buccleuch (Duke) v. Wakefield, which appears to me to differ from the present in every material particular. In the first place, the words to be construed there were not words occurring in an enumeration of various rights reserved of different kinds, but they were words having direct and special application to the subject of mines, minerals, and mineral working; and in connection with that it was said that the lord was to retain his former status and to exercise his powers, not simply "in the same way as if the Act had not been made" (which words occur here), but the words were very emphatic and very remarkable, namely, in the same way, as "if the lands had remained open and uninclosed, or this Act had not been passed;" that is to say, that for the purpose of giving effect to the reservation in the lord's favour, and the rights expressly conferred upon the lord by the Inclosure Act, the hypothesis of the lands remaining in an uninclosed state was, as between him and the surface owner, established by the Act; and that was pointed out as one of the reasons for the conclusion which was arrived at by one of the noble and learned lords who then advised the House. But, secondly, in that case there was not a mere reservation, but there were words operating by themselves to confer, by the authority of the legislature, upon the lord, in respect of the exercise of those reserved rights, a great number of privileges expressly enumerated, and affecting the surface, which might or might not, but probably would not, have followed from a mere reservation. And Lord Hatherley, in advising the House as to its judgment, said that the enumeration of those rights, granted and not merely reserved by the Act of Parliament, was the reason which mainly weighed upon his mind in leading him to the conclusion to which he came, he finding in those words, not indeed in express language a power to let down the surface, but what he thought was practically equivalent to it, namely, a power totally and permanently to destroy the surface, and to take away the beneficial enjoyment of any part of it from the persons to whom the allotment had been made. And thirdly, there was there (which was also much and justly relied upon) an absolute and unqualified clause of compensation; so that whatever might be the extent of the damage sustained, full reparation for that damage would be made to whoever might be the person who sustained it. All those things were relied upon, and all formed ingredients in that judgment, but all are absent here.—p. 295.

LORD WATSON also distinguished Buccleuch (Duke) v. Wakefield and continued: The clause [providing compensation] may, nevertheless, be so expressed as to explain the character and extent of these powers, as was the case in Aspleen v. Seddon (supra, col. 1810), where the power reserved to the mine owner was to work the subjacent minerals without entering upon the surface of the lands. That power would not, of itself, have warranted letting down the surface; but it was made subject to the condition that the person working the mines should pay for all damages to erections on the surface occasioned by the exercise of the reserved power. Entry on the land being prohibited, it was a reasonable, if not a necessary, inference in that case, that the kind of underground working, contemplated and sanctioned, was such as would cause subsidence and injure buildings erected on the surface.—p. 299.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In Lord Mountjoy's Case, property was conveyed to two persons, John and Charles, in fee, and they covenanted and granted with and to their grantor as follows: "That it shall be lawful for Lord Mountjoy, his heirs and assigns, at all times hereafter to have, take, and dig in and upon the heath-ground of the premises from time to time, sufficient ores, heath, turves, and other necessaries for the making, &c., of allom or copperas . . . without let or interruption of the said John and Charles (i.e., the grantees of the land), their heirs or assigns, or either of them." In Anderson's report it is said to have been resolved (inter alia) "(3) that Lord Mountjoy might dig ore and other things for making of allom and copperas, &c., as he should think good." The report leaves it uncertain whether the Lord Mountjoy had an exclusive license or not. But it appears from the report in Leonard that it was held that there was a new grant of an interest to dig to Lord Mountjoy and his heirs in the land, and not a mere covenant, and that Brown (i.e., the grantee of the lands) and his heirs and assigns might dig there notwithstanding the said grant to the said lord. Now, Leonard is well known to have been a very accurate reporter, and Lord Mountjoy's Case has always been regarded as a leading authority for the proposition that a grant in fee of a liberty to dig ores does not confer on the grantee an exclusive right to dig them, even if the grant is in terms without any interruption by the grantor. This was the view taken of the case in Chetham v. Williamson, and in Doe v. Wood, and has never been judicially questioned.—p. 485.

ESHER, M.R.—It has been suggested that some of the propositions there laid down by the learned lords were not necessary to the decision of that case. But I cannot agree that even this Court ought ever to say of a judgment in the House of Lords, which is founded on certain propositions as to a statute, that, though it is clear the House of Lords meant to put a particular interpretation on that statute, we shall disregard what they said because it was not necessary to the case. I take the judgment in that case to be founded on certain propositions enunciated by each of the learned lords. . . . Lord Halsbury says: "In cases to which the statute applies the payment must be according to the weight gotten. From that weight gotten only certain things can be deducted, and the deductions can only be ascertained in a particular way." Lord Bramwell says: "The effect of the enactment, then, is, that the men must be paid by weight, that the weight is to be the weight of all they send up, but that from it may be deducted the weight of certain matters, provided that weight is ascertained in a certain way." Lords Fitzgerald and Herschell seem to me to assent to these propositions. And Lord Macnaghten says: "If the agreement had stated in plain terms that a deduction was to be made from the wages of the miners in respect of slack—whatever form the deduction might have taken, whether the slack was to be absolutely rejected or paid for at a lower rate—no one, I think, could have doubted that that part of the agreement would have been in contravention of the Act of Parliament." Having regard to these opinions . . . how can we hold that the judgment of Grantham, J. in this case is right? It is clear that his judgment is wrong, and that of Charles, J. is right.—p. 392.

SIR R. COLLIER.—The defendant there [*Williams v. The present is not an action against a wrong doer for a trespass, or against a person negligently and improperly exercising a right so as to injure the rights of another. It is a claim against persons who are exercising their undoubted rights,—not negligently or improperly, but subject to a condition which did not exist in the case which has been quoted, namely, that they should pay compensation for damage done. That compensation has been assessed by a competent tribunal once for all, which puts the plaintiff in as good a position as if the damage of which he complains had never been done. After receiving that compensation he will have no right of action for any subsequent damage he may suffer from the same cause.—p. 119.

JAMES, L.J.—I have no doubt that there are some cases which have been relied on in which this Court has not adhered strictly to the rule that a mistake in law is not always incapable of being remedied in this Court: but relief has never been given in the case of a simple money demand by one person against another, there being between those two persons no fiduciary relation whatever, and no equity to supervene by reason of the conduct of either of the parties. It is said that there have been two cases of that kind. In Bingham v. Bingham, a man was held to be entitled to get his money back when he had paid it for a conveyance of his own land from another person. It was held in that case that he was entitled to recover back the money, because he had not the consideration for which he had bargained. The other case is Davis v. Morier, where the relation of trustee and cestui que trust existed between the parties; but when the facts of that case come to be looked into, the person who received the whole income of the fund on trust to apply the same properly, and who was the trustee, retained to himself all except 500*l.* a year, and it appeared that the 500*l.* a year was not all that he ought to have paid to the cestui que trust, and, that being so, the V.-C. (Knight Bruce) directed an inquiry, first, as to whether he had retained more than he ought to have retained; and, secondly, under what circumstances, and whether the other cestuis que trust had in any manner assented to such retainer—that is to say, had acquiesced in it so as to show whether they had given it up. Therefore, there was there a question of a cestui que trust against a trustee, which trustee—no doubt under mistake—had retained trust money in his own possession. That is the nearest case that I have been able to find to the case now before us, but that case is far from establishing the proposition contended for.—p. 355.

FARWELL, J.—I have always understood the law to be that in order to obtain rectification there must be a mistake common to both parties, and if the mistake is only unilateral, there must be fraud or misrepresentation amounting to fraud. It is true that Lord Romilly, in Harris
v. Pepperell and Garrard v. Frankel, and, perhaps, Bacon, V.-C. in Paget v. Marshall, appear to have shrunk from stigmatising the defendant's conduct in terms as fraud, but they treated it as equivalent to fraud, and in my opinion would have had no jurisdiction to grant the relief that they did in the absence of fraud.—p. 623.

COTTON, L.J.—In my opinion, James, Ex parte, lays down this proposition, that when the officer of the Court has in his hands a sum of money which has been paid to him erroneously under a mistake of law, the ordinary rule as between adverse litigants does not apply, but he will be ordered to repay it. It has been urged, and rightly urged, that in James, Ex parte, the money was still in the hands of the trustee, whereas in the present case the money has been distributed among the creditors, and that our decision will be a development of the principle of James, Ex parte. But, in my opinion we must regard the funds available for distribution among the creditors under a bankruptcy or liquidation as one entire fund, and, if that fund has been erroneously increased, I think it is a just extension of James, Ex parte, to say that, out of any moneys which may hereafter be in the hands of the trustee and applicable to the payment of dividends to the creditors, the amount which has come into his hand by mistake ought to be repaid.—p. 313.

Brown, In re, Dixon v. Brown (1886) 55 L. J.
Ch. 556; 32 Ch. D. 597, 602; 54 L. T. 789.

KAY, J.—The judges in those cases treat the assignee or the trustee in bankruptcy as being an officer of the Court, and lay down the rule that money paid to him in mistake of law must be repaid by him; and even if he has spent the actual money, he will be ordered, according to the later of these decisions, to recoup the parties entitled to that money out of other of the bankrupt's assets coming to his hands afterwards. That, as James, L.J. said in the earlier of those cases, is because the Court of Bankruptcy in dealing with its own officers thinks it best to be perfectly honest, and not to regard the technical rule, which is scarcely honest in some cases. Of course I am not exercising the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, but this question is submitted to this Court, and I have no doubt or hesitation in saying that the Court of Chancery does not consider itself bound to act on principles less honest than the Court of Bankruptcy: and if this money was really paid to the trustee in liquidation in mistake of law, I have no hesitation in saying that he must repay it—p. 558.

CHAMBER, J.—I am not aware of any particular danger in extending the law in cases of this sort, for they are for the furtherance of justice; neither do I see the application of the maxim used by Buller, J. in Lowry v. Bourdieu, and cited by the Court in Bilbie v. Lumley, ignorantia juris non excusat. It applies only to cases of delinquency, where an excuse is to be made; I have searched far, to see if I could find any instance of similar application of this maxim. I have a very large collection of maxims, but can find no instance in which this has been so applied. I cannot see how it applies here. In Lowry v. Bourdieu the decision turned on the transaction being illegal, and it being illegal, the maxim applied, in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis.—p. 158. See "MONEY COUNTS."

TINDAL, C.J.—In Milnes v. Duncan, Holroyd, J., says: "If the money had been paid after proceedings had actually commenced, I should have been of opinion that, inasmuch as there was no fraud in the defendant, it could not be recovered back." And as to Cobden v. Kendrick, if it can be supported as to this point, we think it can only be so on the ground of fraud in the defendant. We think the rule of law is accurately laid down by Holroyd, J.—p. 647.

HALSBURY, L.C.—In Milnes v. Duncan (supra), Holroyd, J. states quite accurately what I think is the principle. . . . In Caird v. Moss . . . my brother Lopes, in dealing with the case then before him, not unnaturally referred to the fact of the judgment still standing; and for this reason, because the money in that case was paid under a judgment founded on the construction of an agreement. Then an action was brought to rectify that agreement, on the ground that such a construction was contrary to the intention of the parties. . . . He [Lopes, L.J.] was referring to the fact that the money was paid in that particular case under a judgment, and that that judgment was still standing and no effort had been made to upset it. Under those circumstances, it was a fortiori, of course, that the money could not be recovered back.—p. 227.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The money there [Hamlet v. Richardson] was produced after a writ to recover it had been issued and served and after an appearance had been entered. But what does that mean? It means this—that the defendant says, in substance, to his opponent: "I do not intend to fight you. I will pay rather than fight." If he chooses to take that course he cannot back out of it, whether he discovers that he has made a mistake or does not. That is the ratio decidendi in that case and in several others; of course, money paid under a judgment may be recovered if the judgment is set aside. The C. A., in setting aside a final judgment, always orders the money paid under it to be refunded. That is what my brother Lopes had in his mind in Caird v. Moss.—p. 228.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—A summons had been taken out against the present appellant to compel him to pay this apportionment, and under that threat or fear he paid this money. A series of authorities, from Marriot v. Hampton to the present time, have held that money paid under those circumstances cannot be recovered back.—p. 228.

Ward & Co. v. Wallis (1900) 69 L. J. Q. B. 423; [1900] 1 Q. B. 675; 82 L. T. 261.

KENNEDY, J.—In the first place, the plaintiffs claim to recover the 15% for work and labour done and materials supplied. As to that there has been a settlement of the plaintiffs' claim in the sense that the defendant has satisfied it in the terms of the legal process demanding payment; and in regard to that the plaintiffs' claim is untenable upon the principle laid down in the cases referred in the notes to Marriot v. Hampton, and especially in Moore v. Fulham Vestry, that a payment made under pressure of legal process cannot afterwards be recovered. Marriot v. Hampton and Hamlet v. Richardson were the converse of the present case. In Marriot v. Hampton the defendant submitted to judgment, having lost his receipt, which was his only proof of payment. He afterwards found it, and sought to recover back the amount which had been wrongfully recovered from him. It was held, however, that the matter could not be re-opened. In Moore v. Fulham Vestry it was argued that Marriot v. Hampton was decided upon the principle of res judicata, but it clearly was not. The ground of the decision was that, in the interests of public policy, where a settlement has been arrived at by means of legal process, the money ought not to be allowed to be recovered. . . . It is clear from the authorities collected in the notes to Marriot v. Hampton that the principle that money paid under compulsion of legal process is not recoverable is subject to the qualification that there must have been bona fides on the part of the defendant. In my opinion the same principle applies to the present case.—p. 424.

MATHEW, J.—The distinction between that case and the present is twofold; in the first place the liability of a ratepayer to pay his rates is not a mere private debt but a public obligation; and secondly, there was here no representation whatever as to the extent of the company's liability beyond the fact that the overseers omitted to collect as much as they ought to have done.—p. 46.

A. L. SMITH, J.—Then it was said that the case came within the rule of Skyring v. Greenwood, that money allowed in account under a mistake of law cannot be recovered back, and that the non-demand of the two-thirds was equivalent to an allowance in account. But I do not think that this could in any sense be treated as an allowance in account. The money was not allowed; it was merely not claimed.—p. 47.

LORD LINDLEY.—The rule laid down in Cocks v. Masterman and recently asserted in even wider language by Mathew, J. in London and River Plate Bank, has reference to negotiable instruments, on the dishonour of which notice has to be given to some one—namely, to some drawer or indorser who would be discharged from liability unless such notice were given in proper time. Their lordships are not aware of any authority for applying so stringent a rule to any other cases. Assuming it to be as stringent as is alleged in such cases as those above described, their lordships are not prepared to extend it to other cases where notice of the mistake is given in reasonable time and no loss has been occasioned by the delay in giving it.—p. 4.

ABBOTT, C.J. (for the Court).—The authorities principally in favour of the defendant are those of Faikney v. Reynous and Petrie v. Hannay. The propriety, however, of those decisions has been questioned in the several subsequent cases that were quoted on the part of the plaintiff; and the distinction taken in the former of them between malum prohibitum and malum in se was expressly disallowed in the case of Aubert v. Maze (2 B. & P. 371).—Indeed, we think no such distinction can be allowed in a Court of law; the Court is bound, in the administration of the law, to consider every act to be unlawful which the law has prohibited to be done.—p. 183.

ERLE, C.J.—There is, however, one great distinction between that case and this. There, Partridge was a coachmaker, and Exall, at his request, bailed his carriage with him. The landlord distrained it for rent, and Exall cleared it from that burden by paying the sum claimed; and it was held that the action lay, because the carriage was left upon the defendant's premises at the defendant's request and for his benefit. Here, however, the plaintiff's goods were upon the defendant's premises for the benefit of the owner of the goods, and without any request of the defendant. The plaintiff having seized the goods under the bill of sale, they were his absolute property. He had a right to take them away; indeed, it was his duty to take them away.—p. 532.

 LINDLEY, L.J. (for the Court).—This appears to us a very questionable decision. The evidence did not show that the plaintiff's goods were left in the defendant's house against his consent; and although it is true that the plaintiff only had himself to blame for exposing his goods to seizure, we fail to see how he thereby prejudiced the defendant, or why, having paid the defendant's debt in order to redeem his own goods from lawful seizure, the plaintiff was not entitled to be reimbursed by the defendant. This decision has been questioned before by Thesiger, L.J. [see Ex parte Bishop, In re Fox, 15 Ch. D. at p. 417, where the Lord Justice assumes for the purpose of the case before him, that England v. Marsden was rightly decided, but "will not say that, together with *Sleigh v. BAYLEY, J.—The plaintiff in this case has paid no money. It is said, indeed, that he has given what was equivalent to it, and that it ought to be considered for this purpose as money, and so it was held in Barclay v. Gooch. But in Taylor v. Higgins, the Court having the former case before them, held that the action for money paid could not be maintained. There are, therefore, at all events, conflicting authorities on this point, the last of which is in favour of the defendant.—p. 54.

 HOLMES, J.—Barclay v. Gooch and McKenna v. Hurnett (13 Ir. L. R. 206), in which it was held that a surety who had extinguished the debt by giving his own note could maintain an action for money paid against the principal debtor, were cited by counsel for the plaintiff as authorities that the action will lie where only an equivalent for money has been given. These cases are inconsistent with Maxwell v. Jameson (2 B. & Ald. 51) and Whelan v. Crotty (2 Ir. L. T. 285); and I do not think that they can ever be considered law, for the manifest reason that, as nothing had been paid on the new note before action, the surety had not sustained any damage.—p. 89.

MURPHY, J.—I think that Barclay v. Gooch

has never been overruled in such a way that we should hold it not to be law. I should be prepared to hold that that case has been clearly affirmed by two eminent judges in this country—the late Baron Pennefather and the late Chief Justice Leffroy in *McKenna v. KEKEWICH, J.—I have carefully considered Kay, L.J.'s judgment [Mainland v. Upjohn], and I am satisfied that he did not intend in the slightest degree, to depart from the rule of equity established by the authorities to which I have referred, including James v. Kerr (supra), which was decided by himself, and has since been recognised by the H. L. in Salt v.
Northampton (Marquis). Mainland v. Upjohn established what had already been decided by Kindersley, V.-C. in Potter v. Edwards, that where the initial transaction between mortgagor and mortgagee amounts in fact to this—the payment by the mortgagee of the whole amount of the advance to the mortgagor, and the return by the mortgagor of a certain part of it by way of commission to the mortgagee (there being no surprise or unfair dealing), the whole amount is recoverable under the mortgage, and the commission must not be deducted.—p. 241.

ALVERSTONE, M.R.—I will read the way in which the rule was expressed by a great common law judge (Bowen, L.J.) who, in the C. A., was the dissentient judge in Salt v. Northampton (Marquis), but whose expression of the rule was approved by the H. L. He said: "Whenever a transaction is in reality one of mortgage, equity regards the mortgaged property as security only for money, and will permit of no attempt to clog, fetter or impede the borrower's right to redeem and to rescue what was, and still remains, in equity his own." I could not, of course, hope to express the proposition more clearly. I understand it to mean that the mortgagor is entitled to have back what he mortgaged, and that anything which would prevent his getting back what he mortgaged when the obligation as mortgagor is fulfilled will not be allowed to be good upon the ground that it fetters or impedes his right to redeem. . . . I think I may dismiss with a word Mainland v. Upjohn, as to which I will only say that I doubt whether in early days the stipulation supported in that case would have been held to be legal. Before the usury laws were abolished it certainly would not. Mainland v. Upjohn was a case in which the mortgagee obtained further advantages in the shape of commissions and bonuses out of the property or out of the dealings with the property which was mortgaged to him, and it is clearly distinguishable on the ground that it was a further money consideration in respect of the transactions of mortgage. Biggs v. Hoddinott, . . . it has been suggested, carried the matter further. I doubt myself whether it did. There the stipulation was that the money should not be called in for four or five years. . . . It was a reasonable bargain that there should be a term fixed within which the money should not be called in; and during that time it was perfectly proper that the mortgagor should agree to purchase his beer from the mortgagee during the continuance of his mortgage; but if I have correctly stated the facts of the case and outlined the ground of the decision, it is obvious that it was not a contract which affected the property when redeemed, or which could in any way be said to clog the equity or to interfere with the rights of the mortgagor. . . . Speaking for myself, I do not know that I should have come to the same decision as that at which the C. A. arrived in Santley v. Wilde on the facts of that case without some difficulty, but for the purposes of to-day it is only important that we should see that we are not departing from the rule or from any material principle laid down in Santley v. Wilde, because of course it is binding upon us. . . . But when that judgment of the C. A. is understood, I do not think it either purported to infringe, or did infringe, in any way on the doctrine recognised by the House of Lords in Salt v. Northampton (Marquis). The facts were that Miss Santley, who was going to open a theatre, by the terms of her mortgage agreed that she would pay the principal and interest back by instalments running over five years, and would give a certain share of the profits for the remaining five years, the total term being ten years. There is no doubt that the profits would issue, or might issue, out of the property after the time when the mortgage-money had been repaid; but it is clear that the C. A., as I read that judgment, considered that that was not in any way something which issued out of the equity of redemption, but they thought it was a term of the mortgage that the property should be mortgaged as security for the profits as well as for the 2,000l. . . . He [Cazens-Hardy, J.] refers to Santley v. Wilde, and says: "If I rightly understand the judgment of the C. A., it established that a mortgage of leasehold property, expressed to be a security for the due discharge of future recurring obligations, cannot be redeemed before those obligations have matured; even though the period covered by the obligations may or must exceed the duration of the lease. I do not think any other or larger principle can be extracted from that case." That is the learned judge's view of the principle of the decision in Santley v. Wilde, which I have endeavoured to express from my own point of view, in language of course somewhat different.—pp. 637—640.

RIGBY, L.J.—Without going into detail, I will only indicate the principles which I conceive to be underlying this and similar cases. I would say first that the maxim "Once a mortgage always a mortgage" has not been in any way infringed upon. Of course a maxim of that sort is a convenient thing to refer to, but it must be applied very carefully to the facts in each case. It came indirectly under review in Salt v. Northampton (Marquis); and on reference to the report I venture to say that the only branch of that maxim which was under discussion really was whether there was "once a mortgage," and the majority of the House (Lord Hannon dissenting) came to the conclusion that, as regards the policy, it was ab initio a mortgage. The other half of the maxim, "always a mortgage," was taken for granted by everybody if the first half was established; and therefore I consider Salt v. Northampton (Marquis) is a clear recognition and undoubted enforcement of that maxim. There is another way of expressing the same principle—namely, that you must not “clog the equity of redemption.” . . . Now if—and I do not entertain a doubt about it—those maxims are still in force to their full extent, it would be idle to urge that the equity of redemption is not clogged if the property is taken back as a tied house when it was mortgaged as a free house.—p. 640.

COLLINS, L.J.—The doctrine as to collateral advantage which was considered both in Santley v. Wilde and Biggs v. Hoddinott appears to me not to be very relevant to the decision in this case, nor to impair in the slightest degree the principles stated by Cozens-Hardy, J.—p. 641.

HALSBURY, L.C., after referring to Lord Lindley's judgment in Santley v. Wilde, continued: I cite that case because it appears to me that that lays down the rule; and the differences which are supposed to prevail from time to time appear to me to be only differences of fact, or of the modes in which the various Courts have regarded the fact, as to whether a case came within that rule or not. But I do not believe that there is any portion of that which Lord Lindley laid down in the case which I have cited that has been the subject of doubt or difficulty in any Court whatever. I find that the same question has arisen, and has been very learnedly discussed, in the Irish Courts lately in Browne v. Ryan, and certainly that case is extremely relevant to the question which this House is now discussing, because, in truth, it arose upon what practically are the same facts as in this case, and the learned judges in the C. A. have arrived at the same conclusion as that at which I invite this House to arrive. Fitzgibbon, L.J., in his judgment, and also Holmes, L.J., in referring to the case which I have just cited, appear to consider that that case is inconsistent with the rule which they themselves lay down. I confess I am unable to find any inconsistency.—p. 141.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—There [Browne v. Ryan] a farmer mortgaged his holding to secure 200*l.* and interest; and as part of the mortgage transaction it was stipulated that the mortgagor should sell his holding within twelve months, employ the mortgagee as the auctioneer at a certain commission, and pay him the like commission if the conduct of the sale was given to any one else. The C. A. held, and in my opinion rightly held, that the stipulation had no effect after redemption. The judgments of the learned judges in the C. A. seem to me, if I may venture to say so, to contain a very clear exposition of the law. They had occasion to consider the judgment of the English C. A. in Santley v. Wilde, and they expressed their disapproval of the conclusion at which the English C. A. arrived. Speaking for myself, with all deference to Lord Lindley, I cannot help sharing that view. I do not in the least dissent from the propositions laid down by Lord Lindley, taking them separately. But the transaction in that case seems to me to have been nothing more than an ordinary mortgage to secure an advance of money, with a superadded obligation offending against the settled principles of equity in that it rendered redemption impossible. . . . Nor can I agree with the President of the Probate Division, who seems to have thought that Santley v. Wilde was covered by the decision in Biggs v. Hoddinott—a decision to which, as it seems to me, no objection can be taken.—p. 143.

LORD DAVEY.—In Salt v. Northampton (Marquis) the question was whether a certain life policy, the premiums on which were charged against the mortgagor, was comprised in the mortgage security. That question having been decided in the affirmative, it was declared to be redeemable, notwithstanding an express provision to the contrary contained in the deed. . . . I do not dissent from the opinion expressed by Lord Lindley when M.R. in Santley v. Wilde. . . . I confess I should have decided Santley v. Wilde differently from the way in which it was dealt with in the C. A. After the payment of principal and interest and everything which had become payable up to the date of redemption, the property in that case remained charged with the payment to the mortgagee of one third share of the profits, and the stipulation to that effect should, I think, have been held to be a clog or fetter on the right to redeem. . . . I only desire to add that, with Lord Macnaghten, I cannot assent altogether to the assumption made by Cozens-Hardy, J. that the covenant constituted, or might constitute, a good charge upon the property by virtue of the operation of the doctrine in Tulk v. Moshay [(1848) 18 L. J. Ch. 83; 2 Ph. 774. See “LANDLORD AND TENANT”]. I should hesitate some time before I assented to that proposition, but it is perfectly immaterial for the decision in the present case, because, as I have already said, I think that the covenant did not continue after the redemption, and that the mere attempt to make it a charge on the property would render it void.—pp. 144, 145.

LORD LINDLEY.—I regard the mortgage-deed in this case as another unsuccessful attempt to lay a new burden on land not warranted by law or by the doctrine laid down in Tulk v. Moshay, which has often lately been relied upon as going much further than it does. The conclusion thus arrived at is not inconsistent with Santley v. Wilde, on which the appellants so strongly rely. Some of this House think that case went too far. I do not think so myself; but I will not trouble to consider its details, which were complicated. The principle on which the C. A. decided that case was, I still think, sound. Whether it was properly applied in that case is now of no importance. I believe the true principle applicable to these cases to be that expounded by the C. A. in Biggs v. Hoddinott and Santley v. Wilde. That principle is perfectly consistent with a real pledge and with the maxim, "Once a mortgage always a mortgage." . . . I am satisfied that the C. A. [Browne v. Ryan] did not go too far in holding that the plaintiff's action for damages could not be sustained.—p. 145.

Moreover, the mortgagor was induced to execute the mortgage by misrepresentation. Lord (Helm)ford distinctly said so, and Lord Westbury merely said it was not necessary to put the case so high. In Coupe v. Collyer the impeached deed was held to be only an escrow; there was there no relation of banker and customer, and the mortgagees never placed money in the hands of the mortgagor's solicitor for investment.—p. 794.

O'BRIEN, C.J.—It seems to me that the result of the decision in Eyre v. M'Dowell is that a statutory mortgage under the Judgment Mortgage Act attaches upon the entire beneficial interest of the debtor in the lands at the time of the recovery of the judgment: in other words, that it operates as an innocent conveyance. The judgment mortgage takes out of the debtor everything that remains in him, or that he could assign.—p. 522.

FRY, J.—That case [Langridge v. Payne] is one which I cannot help regretting to find reported, because the judgment does not tell the reader upon what principle it proceeded, and it is merely a judgment restraining an ejectment until the hearing. The case was this: there was an agreement in writing that the mortgagee would not call in the money for two years, the mortgagor fulfilling the covenants. The mortgagor forgot to pay the interest, and the mortgagee gave him notice that in consequence of his failure to pay interest the mortgagee would not be bound as to the two years, but would exercise his discretion, and the latter requested payment of the interest due and the costs. The interest and costs were paid, and then the mortgagee issued a writ in ejectment. He was restrained until the hearing. Now, the V.-C. might have thought that the notice was a conditional demand, and that the mortgagee, in fact, said:

"If you make this payment, I will for the present waive my right;" and if that was so, there was ground for the injunction. It is worthy of note that when that case was called to the attention of the judge of the Landed Estates Court in Ireland, Taaffe's Estate, In re, he spoke in very strong terms, and said that the case would be overruled, and that he could not conjecture the ground of the doctrine on which it was decided.
In other words, he thought it a mere determination on the balance of convenience till the hearing, and not on any doctrine. There is no principle in Langridge v. Payne inconsistent with my decision.—p. 203.

FRY, J.—In the European Central Ry., the covenant being to pay the principal sum with interest "until repayment thereof," the Court held that these words meant "until the day fixed for payment." And therefore they held that there was no covenant to pay beyond the day fixed for repayment of the principal. Here I have held that there is an express covenant to continue the payment of interest so long as the security should continue.—p. 100. And see Roberts, In re (supra, col. 1858).

COTTON, L.J.—The covenant there [Popple v. Sylvester] was entirely different from the covenant in the present case. The covenant there was to pay interest at 7 per cent. so long as any money should remain due on the security of the deed, and, assuming that decision to have been right, that it remained in force after judgment had been recovered for the principal debt, in my opinion it does not control the present case, where the claim is one of debt, not a claim in an action for redemption or foreclosure.—p. 350.

LINDLEY, L.J.—When we look at the authorities, it appears to me that this case is much more closely within European Central Ry., In re, than Popple v. Sylvester, in which the language of the Court pointed to money remaining due on the security of the deed. Here the language is entirely different.—p. 354.

JESSEL, M.R.—Then I am referred to Stains v. Banks, which I should have felt great trouble in dealing with, had I not been counsel in the case, and so recollected it; for there Stuart, V.-C., decided two things; first, that a mortgagee who took possession of two farms comprised in separate mortgages was in the same position as if he had been paid his interest on the day fixed, and was therefore not entitled to charge the higher rate of interest; and in the next place, because the mortgagee did not collect the rents himself but employed an agent to do so at a commission, the V.-C. held that the mortgagee was not justified in employing an agent, and accordingly disallowed the commission. I happened to recollect that that decision was appealed from, and accordingly I sent for the Registrar's book, when I found that the decision was reversed, and that the mortgagee was allowed a higher rate of interest and the whole of his claim for commission paid to his receiver.—p. 57.

KEKEWICH, J.—It appears from the cases that if the mortgagee takes proceedings in Court to recover his mortgage money from the mortgagor, or, if he is dead, from his estate, then he, the mortgagee, cannot refuse a tender of his principal, interest and costs on the ground that he is entitled to six months' notice. . . . This was decided . . . in Letts v. Hutchins, which was cited in Smith v. Smith, where Romer, J. considered that the ground of Wickens, V.-C.'s judgment was that the mortgagee had taken steps to compel payment of the debt, and was therefore not entitled to six months' interest in lieu of notice.—p. 543.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—It is well settled that, where a mortgage is transferred without the privity of the mortgagor, the transferee takes subject to the state of account between the mortgagor and mortgagee at the date of the transfer: Matthews v. Walwyn (supra). It is also settled that payments of interest or payments on account and capital made by the mortgagor to the mortgagee after, but without the knowledge of, a transfer must, in the absence of collusion, be allowed to the mortgagor as against the transferee: Williams v. Sorrell (supra). This doctrine has been extended to the case where the whole of the mortgage debt is, under similar circumstances, paid off: see Norrish v. Marshall, and Southampton's (Lord) Estate, In re.

Apart from these authorities I should have thought it reasonable to hold that, where the mortgagor, being entitled on payment off of the mortgage to the actual custody of the mortgage deed and other documents of title which in fact are in the possession of the transferee, chooses to pay the mortgagee without asking for the deeds, he ought not to be allowed as against the transferee to justify such payment. I should have thought that this negligence on the part of the mortgagor was far greater than the negligence of the transferee in omitting to give notice of the transfer. But I am asked to apply the principle to a case where the money which is said to have been paid by Winch to Dent in satisfaction of the mortgage was part of the purchase-money procured by the solemn statement in the conveyance by Winch and by Dent that there was not any mortgage, and that there never had been any mortgage. I decline thus to extend the doctrine.—p. 575.

STIRLING, J.—To my mind, the decision in Teevan v. Smith depended on facts and principles totally different from those with which I am now dealing. There a mortgagor having made first and second mortgages, tendered to the first mortgagee the amount due on his mortgage, and then claimed under sect. 15 of the Conveyancing Act a transfer to his own nominee of the mortgage debt and security. It was held that he was not entitled to do so, to the prejudice of the second mortgagee.—p. 646.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—Wheeler v. Montefiore was also much pressed upon us. That was a mortgage deed by way of lease for years, as was the case here with respect to part of the premises; and also an assignment of personal property as a security. The action was trespass against a sheriff, for breaking and entering the plaintiff's house, and taking his goods. The true ground of that decision was, that a lessee for years, before entry, cannot maintain trespass as to the goods; and that, by the deed, the plaintiff was not to have possession until the day of payment, which had not then arrived. Some expressions are used in the judgment as to the construction of the deed; but the real ground of the decision was as above stated.—p. 88.

LORD WESTBURY.—Neesom v. Clarkson arose under these peculiar circumstances. A man had contracted to purchase a fee simple. He died before he had paid the money; he made his widow his universal legatee and devisee. The equitable estate which he, therefore, acquired by virtue of that contract, passed, under his will, to his widow. His widow married again, and her second husband, supposing himself to be entitled, paid the purchase-money under that contract. He then mortgaged the estate, the estate being one to which he was entitled only jure uxoris, save in respect of the lien he had on it by having paid the purchase-money. He mortgaged it and then conveyed it absolutely to a purchaser, in whose purchase deed, however, there were recitals stating, clearly and distinctly, in what character the vendor, that is to say, the second husband, had acquired an interest in the estate. The widow died, and the second husband died; and on the death of the widow, there being no child of her marriage with her second husband, the estate of course descended to the heir-at-law. The heir-at-law filed a bill for the redemption of the property, and it was held by the V.-C. (unquestionably a strong decision) that the recitals in the purchase deed gave distinct notice to the purchaser from the second husband that all his interest in the estate ceased upon the death of the wife, and that all that he could become entitled to was a claim in respect of the money which his vendor had paid on the original purchase. He, however, claimed to continue in possession; he was in possession, and he claimed to continue so. It was held that he had no title to the possession, save in respect of his lien for the purchase-money; and then, certainly by a very strong stretch of the authority of the Court and of the principle, it was held, that, as his purchase deed gave him a most distinct notice of the determination of the title of his vendor, and that he himself had no other claim than in respect of that sum of money which had been paid, his subsequent receipts must be referred to the only interest he had and, accordingly, he was charged with an account directed with wilful default. That approaches very nearly to the present case in favour of the appellant, but certainly stops somewhat short of it, and is distinguishable from it (though, if it were not distinguishable, I confess I should not have been disposed to recommend your lordships to follow that authority), because in the case then before the V.-C. there was nothing to set aside; and it was held that the conveyance, upon the very face of it, was pregnant with information to the party that he had no title whatever, save in respect of his lien for the purchase-money. In the present case there was a question to be determined at the hearing; the question was this: whether the power of sale given to Chambers, which in its terms, required notice to be given to the personal representatives of Parkinson, could nevertheless be operative, there being no such personal representative. It was held that it could not, and that the power did not arise, and that the conveyance therefore must be set aside.—p. 299.

JESSEL, M.R.—There is another observation I wish to make on the supposed necessity of notice, and there are some words in the judgment of Lord Langdale in Sandon v. Hooper which I have always declined to read literally, and which do not appear to me to be warranted by the judgment of Lord Lyndhurst. That is, as to notice. I am by no means prepared to say that Lord Langdale did not mean exactly what I am going to say: I rather think he did: but it was imperfectly expressed either by himself or by the reporter. As I understand it, notice is not necessary if the improvement is a reasonable one, and produces a benefit. The mortgagee cannot be deprived of that benefit because he did not tell the mortgagor of it. If on the other hand it is an unreasonable one, and produces no advantage, I do not see why the mortgagor should be charged with it because the mortgagee gives him notice of it. He could not prevent it, the mortgagee being in possession. That being so, it seems to me that the real doctrine as to notice is, that where the mortgagee gives the mortgagor notice of the expenditure, and the mortgagor agree to it, then of course it is unnecessary for the mortgagee to show that the expenditure was reasonable. It is a contract. If the mortgagor does not actually agree to it, but does such acts as in the view of a Court of law amount to tacit consent, or, as it is sometimes called, "acquiescence," that will also put the mortgagee in an equally advantageous position. But if the mortgagor simply does nothing, it appears to me that notice cannot affect the rights of the parties either way. I think that is the true explanation of what was intended by Lord Langdale in Sandon v. Hooper, and I think that is the real view of the law on the subject.—p. 479.

CATRNS, L.C.—The case would be entirely different if any misstatement had been made by the railway company, if anything had been said by the railway company to Mr. Robson, or if anything had been placed by them on the face of any document which would have stated something which was not the case, upon the faith of which Mr. Robson would have acted. That was the question which came before the Court in Rice v. Rice . . . which appears to have been an authority acted upon by the Court of Exchequer Chamber. . . . Waldron v. Sloper . . . is a case also entirely separate and distinct from the present. There the incumbrancer, who had no interest whatever as a mortgagee except by the delivery to him, and the retainer by him, of the title deeds of the property, chose to give up those title deeds. It is true that he gave them up upon an allegation that they were wanted for a temporary purpose, but in place of asking for them again, and of regaining the possession of them when that temporary purpose was satisfied, he allowed them to remain in the hands of the mortgagor for a number of years—I think for three or four years—and during that space of time during which he was virtually leaving his security in the possession of another, that other, by the possession of the title deeds, was enabled to create a fresh equitable interest which was held in consequence of the laches of the first mortgagee to have priority over the first. Neither of these cases has, as it appears to me, any application to the present.—p. 41.

COTTON, L.J.—Then there was Waldron v. Sloper; and that is the case which may be said to be most like the present; but what was it? Waldron had an equitable security which was the first incumbrance on the property, and he put the deeds, not into the hands of a person who owed any duty to him, but into the hands of his mortgagor, and then that mortgagor kept them, without any inquiry from Waldron, and dealt with the property on the footing that he was entitled to the deeds. In my opinion that is an entirely different case from one in which a person lets his solicitor have his deeds in his hands, or trusts to his solicitor when the solicitor has undertaken a duty for him, and has, as in this case, made himself a trustee of that which he ought to have acquired in the name of his client, but has in fact acquired in his own name.—p. 409.

HALL, V.-C.—I think the principle there [Perry-Herrick v. Attwood] laid down is that it is not merely the incumbrancer who gets possession of the deeds who obtains the better equity. That is the first point to consider. That is really an equity which the possessor of the deeds obtains as against the legal owner, and he individually by obtaining the deeds gets a better equity to postpone the legal owner, but I cannot dispose of the case upon that ground merely, without considering whether the postponement does not operate for the benefit of anybody else who, in fact, came in innocently, and in the belief that there was not in existence the first mortgage in point of date. Both parties believed that they were obtaining the deeds—the one from whom inquiry, in fact, was made, and the other who in reference to his security made the inquiry—he is now equally entitled to the benefit of the negligence on the part of the legal owner who did not obtain possession of the deeds: i.e., the subsequent incumbrancer having made inquiry into the matter, and having acted in the belief that the mortgagee who had got the first benefit of postponement by having obtained the deeds—he and anybody else who bona fide advanced his money founded on the like belief, and arising out of the transaction in regard to the deeds, and connected with it, is entitled to the same benefit on the like principle of equity. It seems to me that the decision in Perry-Herrick v. Attwood is not explainable with reference to the subsequent incumbrancer in that case, except on that principle.—p. 129.

CHITTY, J.—That case is distinguishable. As between himself and the equitable owner the trustee there had no authority whatever to deal with the trust property. Here the testator, the author of the trust, has confided to Newbrook authority to sell the property and to give a receipt for the purchase money. Newbrook was acting within the scope of his authority. The essential part of the breach of trust was the giving of the receipt without in fact receiving the purchase money. The circumstances appear to me to bring the case within the range of the authority of Perry-Herrick v. Attwood (col. 1873), recently approved of by the House of Lords in Brooklesby v. Temperance Permanent Building Society (supra, col. 1874). For the purpose now under consideration, I am unable to see any material distinction between agency and trust. Furthermore Lord Romilly's decision in Worthington v. German [(1867) 16 W. R. 187] substantially covers the present case, and is in favour of the plaintiffs.—p. 681.

STIRLING, L. J.—The leading authorities on this point appear to be Cory v. Eyre (supra, col. 1870), Shropshire Union Rys. Co. and Canal Co. v. Reg., and Vernon Ewens & Co., In re (post, col. 1876), before the C. A. This last case in some of its features bears a resemblance to the present. A client left in the hands of his solicitors 11,000*l.* for investment. The solicitors represented that this sum was invested on mortgage of certain specified property, and the client made no further inquiry. The solicitors were in fact the holders of a mortgage for 55,000*l.* on the specified property, and afterwards dealt with the mortgage by giving it up in exchange for other property in which they acquired an equity of redemption; and this equitable interest they subsequently sold. It was held that the solicitors must be treated as having become trustees for their client of 11,000*l.* out of the 55,000*l.* secured by the mortgage, and having as against the client dealt improperly with this mortgage; and consequently that the latter was entitled to a charge on the substituted property. It was further held that the client was entitled to enforce this charge against the purchasers. Cotton, L. J. makes these remarks: "Then there was a case of Waldron v. Sloper (supra, col. 1870): and that is the case which may be said to be most like the present; but what was it? Waldron had an equitable security which was the first incumbrance on the property, and he puts the deeds, not into the hands of a person who owed any duty to him, but into the hands of his mortgagor, and then that mortgagor kept them, without any inquiry from Waldron, and dealt with the property on the footing that he was entitled to the deeds. In my opinion that is an entirely different case from one in which a person lets his solicitor have his deeds in his hands, or trusts to his solicitor when the solicitor has undertaken a duty for him, and has, as in this case, made himself a trustee of that which he ought to have acquired in the name of his client, but has in fact acquired in his own name;" and his lordship also says, "it is not a sufficient ground for postponing the client, for whom the solicitor had become a trustee, simply because the client had not made inquiry as to how the solicitor had performed his duty." The principle was applied by Chitty, J. in Carritt v. Real and Personal Advance Co.—a strong case. I think that it must also be applied here.—p. 487.

NORTH, J.—Some little doubt has been thrown upon that case [Browne v. Savage] by the remark of Lord St. Leonards in a note to Vendors and Purchasers [14th ed. p. 379]. He says: "There is a mistake in the dates; they do not agree with the priorities ordered." But I have looked very carefully at the case, and it seems to me that the note by Lord St. Leonards is inaccurate, and he seems to have confused the notices and to have thought that the notice given by the second trustee to the third on the 30th July, 1858, was the ruling notice, whereas the true ruling notice as regards the mortgage of 1858 by Savage to the second trustee was not of that date, but was the assignment itself, which was dated the 29th of March, 1858. It seems to me that the decision of Kindersley, V.-C. was quite accurate, and that the priorities were given according to what he decided to be the right order of the notices.—p. 680.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In Browne v. Savage, Kindersley, V.-C. said that trustees "must, for their own security, give correct information when inquiry is made of them, whether they have had notice of any prior assignments affecting their trust property." Mr. Lewin in his well-known work (Lewin on Trusts, 8th ed. p. 704), refers to that case as an authority for the proposition that trustees are bound to answer such inquiries. But when this opinion is examined it can scarcely be supported, and if such a doctrine were logically carried out it would impose very serious duties upon trustees.—p. 99.

STIRLING, L.J.—A legal mortgagee who makes an advance without notice of a prior equitable title is a purchaser for value without notice. From such a purchaser a Court of equity takes away nothing which he has honestly acquired. —Pitcher v. Rawlins ((1872) 41 L. J. Ch. 485; L. R. 7 Ch. 259) and Heath v. Crealock (post, col. 1883). Further, an equitable mortgagee who has made an advance without notice of a prior equitable title may gain priority by getting in the legal title, unless there are circumstances which make it inequitable for him so to do. One case that falls within this exception is where the mortgagee has notice that the legal title at the time when it is so got in is held on an express trust in favour of persons who assert a claim to the property.—Saunders v. Dehew, Allen v. Knight, Sharples v. Adams (post), and Taylor v. Russell (post, col. 1888).—p. 485.

JESSEL, M.R.—There is no doubt that you cannot gain priority by obtaining the legal estate from a trustee who commits a breach of trust in transferring it to you; but Sharples v. Adams seems to go beyond that, for Lord Romilly says, "If the owner in fee simple, having the legal estate, creates an equitable charge in favour of A., and afterwards a second equitable charge in favour of B., and then a third equitable charge in favour of C., I apprehend that he cannot alter these equities by transferring the legal estate to any one of them, and the fact of the transfer of the legal estate to C., the owner of the third equitable charge, would not affect the rights of the first or second" (p. 17). . . . I wish to state so distinctly, because I am not quite sure that, without further authority, I should go quite so far as my predecessor did in the case of the illustration he gave in Sharples v. Adams.—p. 19.

NORTH, J.—But what is here contended for is not the ratio decidendi of that case [Maxfield v. Burton], but the language of Sir George Jessel. His lordship, after putting the case upon constructive notice, continued: This is his language:—"I prefer to decide the case upon that ground, but I do not think I should be at liberty to disregard the fact that there was in this case a contract to convey for value, as well as a deposit, and I should not be the first to hold that a man who had entered into such a contract could subsequently, at his option, squeeze out the person who was entitled to the benefit of that contract, by conveying the legal estate to a person with whom he has entered into a subsequent contract for value, even although that person should be a purchaser without notice. If it were necessary to resort to that, I should decide in favour of the plaintiffs, even on that ground." Now, I take it that it is clearly settled that if the owner of an estate makes an equitable mortgage in favour of one person, and subsequently makes a legal mortgage in favour of another person, without notice, then the latter is to be preferred. It is certainly somewhat startling to find that the late M.R. has said anything at variance with that. But I think, upon examining the facts of the case, an explanation of his language will appear. He is dealing with the case of a person who has created a first equitable charge, and then has created a second equitable charge, and has afterwards conveyed the legal estate to the second mortgagee without any consideration, and his observations must be confined to that case alone. It is clear that this was his meaning, from what he said in the subsequent case of Mumford v. Stohwasser (post, col. 1889), Sir G. Jessel's language in that case clearly shows that in his earlier decision he was referring to the case where no value was given for the legal estate.—p. 136.

CHELMSFORD, L.C.—Hewitt v. Loosemore is a clear and distinct authority. It is said that Sir G. Turner, then V.-C., in that case laid down a new doctrine when he held, that where a bond fide inquiry is made for the deeds, and a reasonable excuse is given for their not being forthcoming, there is no ground for imputing knowledge which a further and fuller inquiry might have imported; and this decision was said not to have given satisfaction to the profession. But it would appear that Sir G. Turner founded himself on a long course of prior authorities, examined them all with his usual care, and arrived at his conclusion only after the most full and careful examination. I think that judgment is consonant with the prior decisions, which will govern me in this case.—p. 314.

LINDLEY, M.R.—The decision of James, L.J. in Ratcliffe v. Barnard was right, but he went too far when he said that the negligence must be such as to lead the Court to conclude that the person was an accomplice in a fraud. I do not agree with that, but it is another thing if a person is so careless as not to be entitled to be treated as a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The case on which James, L.J. relied in support of his dictum is Hunt v. Elmes. Turner, L.J. there states the principle more circumspectly. He says a legal mortgagee cannot be postponed by reason of his not having possession of the title deeds, unless there has been fraud or gross and wilful negligence on his part. I can go with him, but I cannot go so far as James, L.J. It is not right to say that the legal owner must be guilty of fraud or negligence amounting to fraud to be postponed. It is sufficient if his negligence is so gross as to make it unjust to prefer him to the other person.—p. 585.

CAIRNS, L.C.—With regard to that case [Wormald v. Maitland] I can only say, that if it is to be held as deciding, that in a register country, with such a statute as exists in Ireland, the mere circumstance that, on the occasion of a marriage, the abstract of title to the property settled was not examined on behalf of the lady about to be married, and on behalf of the children who might be born, the mere fact that there was not this examination would postpone the registered settlement—if that is the effect of the decision I am unable, my lords, to say that that is a decision which commends itself to my judgment. It appears that in Allen's Estates, In re, which was decided in Ireland, the learned judge in the Landed Estates Court founded his decision upon Wormald v. Maitland; but it appears from what was said in the present case by Christian, L.J., that at the time the learned judge of the Landed Estates Court so decided, he was not aware that the then L.C. of Ireland (Brewster, L.C.) had [in Russell v. Cusheil, Madden on Registration] decided in opposition to the view expressed in Wormald v. Maitland. I cannot take, therefore, that case as an authority governing or affecting the present case; and that case being removed out of the way, there is absolutely no authority that I am aware of in support of the proposition of the appellants.—p. 149.

COTTON, L.J.—I do not think that the question of what constitutes constructive notice arises here, and with regard to Kettlewell v. Watson, I will only say that the Court was there dealing with the question of what was necessary to enable the legal estate to be postponed to an equitable claim, and in the later case of Northern Counties Fire Ins. Co. v. Whipp (supra, col. 1885), Fry, L.J., himself distinctly recognised the distinction between the case of a contest between equities and one between an equitable title and the legal estate. He says: "The question is not what circumstances may as between two equities give priority to the one over the other, but what circumstances justify the Court in depriving a legal mortgagee of the benefit of the legal estate." And the judgment in Kettlewell v. Watson is to the same effect.—p. 12.

STIRLING, L.J.—The rules which govern the postponement of a prior legal estate to a subsequent equitable estate were in the year 1884 laid down by Fry, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the C. A. in Northern Counties of England Fire Insce. Co. v. Whipp (supra, col. 1885). In 1890 Kay, J., in Taylor v. Russell, carefully considered the law with respect to the postponement of a prior to a subsequent equitable interest, and came to the conclusion that the same rules as those laid down in Northern Counties of England Fire Insce. Co. v. Whipp applied to the case before him. On appeal, his lordship's decision was reversed on another ground, and the C. A. declined to consider any question as to the relative equities which arose under the circumstances of the case. In the H. L. the decision of the C. A. was affirmed on the same ground; but Lord Macnaghten, in advising the House, took occasion to remark that he was not satisfied of the correctness of the view taken by Kay, J. I am not aware that the precise point considered by the learned judge has since arisen for decision; and if it were necessary to decide it in the present case I should think it my duty to examine with the utmost care his judgment in Taylor v. Russell, and the authorities relied on by him. I think, however, that on the present occasion such an examination may be dispensed with.—p. 487.

STIRLING, J.—Now a purchaser for value without notice is entitled to the benefit of a legal title, not merely where he has actually got it in, but where he has a better title or right to call for it. This rule is laid down in Wilkes v. Bodington. It has accordingly been held that if a purchaser for value takes an equitable title only, or omits to get in an outstanding legal title, and a subsequent purchaser for value without notice procures, at the time of his purchase, the person in whom the legal title is vested to declare himself a trustee for him, or even to join as party in a conveyance of the equitable interest (although he may not formally convey or declare a trust of the legal estate), still the subsequent purchaser gains priority—see Wilkes v. Bodington, Maundrell v. Maundrell, Stanhope v. Verney (supra, col. 1888), Wilmot v. Pike and Roper v. Harrison ((1855) 2 K. & J. 86 (supra, col. 1877)).—p. 488.

KAY, J.—In Malcolm v. Charlesworth a legacy charged by the will upon land in Yorkshire having been assigned, it was held that such assignment did not affect the land within the meaning of the Yorkshire Registry Act, but was an assignment of the money charged upon the land, and of the money only. It is said, however, in argument, that this case is not law. It is cited by Lord St. Leonards (Vendors and Purchasers (11th ed., p. 973; 14th ed., p. 727)), without disapproval, and also in Dart (5th ed., p. 681). I am not informed that it has ever been dissented from, and therefore I could not disregard it if I disagreed with the decision, which I do not.—p. 707.

 MONROE, J.—The charge was there [Malcolm v. Charlesworth] already, and the deed merely operated to transfer the money from one person to another. In Arden v. Arden lands were assigned to trustees in trust, to sell and distribute the proceeds among certain persons named. One of the persons entitled to a distributive share of the fund executed a mortgage of such share, and it was held that the Registry Act of Middlesex did not apply to such a deed. The deed did not purport in any way to affect the lands. The trustees had full power of sale, and it was only when the lands were actually sold, and the proceeds realised, that the mortgage was to be satisfied. Those cases are entirely distinct from the present, where an owner purports to charge the lands themselves.—p. 430.

MALINS, V.-C.—In Sumpter v. Cooper the Court of Q. B. held that the Statute of Anne [9 Anne, c. 18] referred only to the registration of instruments under seal; but that is not the construction put upon the Act by this Court. . . . I confess I am somewhat surprised at the conclusion which the M.R. seems to have come to in that case [Wright v. Stanfield], a conclusion in my mind contrary to the rules of the Court; but I am relieved from any difficulty by . . . Moore v. Culverhouse, where his lordship came to a different conclusion, and held that an unregistered equitable charge on the equity of redemption of a property in Middlesex must be postponed to a subsequent registered mortgage of the same property. I do not think that these two cases can stand together, and I am of opinion that Moore v. Culverhouse overruled Wright v. Stanfield. This appears to have been the view taken by Wood, V.-C., in Neve v. Pennell.—p. 69.

HATHERLEY, L.C. (for self and SELWYN, L.J.).
 —We think it right to observe that in Wallwyn
v. Lee the sole object of the suit was the recovery of the title deeds; and the Court there refused to give assistance against a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. Lord Eldon referred to the principle that this Court will not stir against a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. There appears to us to be a material distinction between such a case as Wallwyn v. Lee, and cases in which, either in consequence of the fund being in Court, as in Stackhouse v.
Jersey (Countess) (post), or, in consequence of the legal estate being outstanding in a trustee, and the beneficial interest being claimed by several adverse but equally innocent purchasers for value without notice, the Court is called upon to declare and does declare the right to the fund or estate in question. In such cases the Court is necessarily called upon to make, and does make, a decree against some one or more of such purchasers for value; but as in the language of Lord St. Leonards in Smith v. Chichester, "it is clearly settled that the right to the estate confers
 the right to the possession of the title deeds," such a decree would be obviously incomplete in a material particular if, while declaring the plaintiff to be absolutely entitled to the whole beneficial interest in the estate, it left the title deeds in the possession of one of the defendants, claiming to hold them under an adverse title which the same decree declared to have no valid foundation. In Joyce v. De Moleyns, Lord St.
 Leonards expressly states that the very point which he was then called upon to decide in that case had been decided in Wallwyn v. Lee, and in the same judgment he mentions and recognises Smith v. Chichester (supra, col. 1892), to which we have already referred.—p. 150.

EARL OF SELBORNE.—The case of Wallwyn v.
Lee, before Lord Eldon, was that of a plea (which was allowed) to relief as well as discovery; and that of Joyce v. De Moleyns, before Lord St. Leonards, was also one in which the defence (which prevailed) was to the whole suit.

CAMPBELL, L.C. (after considering Gordon v. Graham at length).—A mistaken notion had got abroad that Gordon v. Graham had been expressly overruled by the H. L. in Shaw v. Neale (supra), the ratio decidendi there steering quite clear of this question. But I am of opinion that the doctrine supposed to have been laid down in Gordon v. Graham is not sound, and that it ought now to be overruled by your lordships.—p. 470.

LORD CRANWORTH dissented.

CHITTY, L.J.—Where the mortgagee is seeking to tack his advances made after notice of a subsequent incumbrance, is the principle of Hopkinson v. Rolt excluded by the circumstance that the mortgagee has entered into a covenant to make the advances? In Hopkinson v. Rolt there was no such covenant, and the subsequent advances which the mortgagee was not allowed to tack were merely voluntary. In this respect the case before us differs. Hopkinson v. Rolt was considered by the H. L. in Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs (supra, col. 1896), and in Union Bank of Scotland v. National Bank of Scotland (supra). In Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs, a limited company had stipulated for a paramount lien on its shares for any moneys that might become due from the shareholder. The bank, with notice of this agreement for a lien, made advances on shares. The shareholder subsequently became indebted to the company, and the company claimed priority for these subsequent debts incurred after notice given by the bank of their security; and contended that the bank, knowing the terms on which the shares were issued and taking with notice, could not set up their charge as against the company. This contention was negatived by the H. L. The principle on which these decisions are founded appears to me to be that a mortgagee cannot obtain a charge on property which is no longer the mortgagor's to charge, and which the mortgagee knows at the time he makes his farther advance is no longer the property of the mortgagor. No charge arises for a further advance until it is actually made. This principle is plain and simple, and based on natural justice and fair dealing. If this be the principle (which I think it is), the covenant to make further advances creates no difficulty—and for this reason: the covenant is to make the further advance on the security of the property, and, inasmuch as the mortgagor has by his own act deprived himself of the power to give the stipulated security, no action for damages would lie on the covenant. It is hardly necessary to add that no action lies for specific performance of any agreement to make a loan.—p. 132.

JESSEL, M.R.—As the present case is distinguishable from Toulmin v. Steere it is not necessary for us to consider whether that case is or is not binding on the C. A. The V.-C. rightly considered that it was binding upon him as a judge of first instance, and it ought perhaps to be held that it is binding on the C.A., and that only the H. L. has power to overrule it. On that point I will give no opinion. Assuming it, however, to be binding upon us, it amounts to no more than this, that in the case of a purchase from the owner of an equity of redemption, in which the purchase-money is partly applied in paying off incumbrances, the purchaser with notice, whether actual or constructive, of other incumbrances is not, in the absence of any contemporaneous expression of intention, entitled as against the other incumbrancers, of whose securities he has notice, to say afterwards that the incumbrances so paid off are not extinguished. It does not go beyond that, and there are several authorities which say that this doctrine is not to be carried further.—p. 645.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The L.J.J. thought that the intention of the parties to extinguish Norton's interest was to be found in the terms of the deed and the circumstances under which it was executed, and they rested their decision on the law laid down by Sir G. Jessel, M.R. in Adams v. Angell. In that case the learned judge stated the effect of the doctrine originally enunciated in Toulmin v. Steere, that where the purchaser of an estate pays off an incumbrance upon it, the incumbrance paid off is merged unless the contrary intention appears, and he pointed out its application in the case of an owner in fee or in tail, or of a purchaser. It is to be observed that the doctrine referred to is founded on the principle of merger. The assignment of an incumbrance to an owner or purchaser of an estate does not transfer any new estate, it only frees from the incumbrance an estate already vested in him, or about to be vested in him by conveyance. As Sir G. Jessel points out, the assignment to a purchaser of an estate, of an equitable charge upon it, really passes nothing. It may nevertheless be treated as remaining on foot for the purpose of protecting the purchaser against mesne incumbrances. In view of the nature of the interests assigned by Norton and Lord Windsor respectively, to which I have called attention, I find it difficult to understand how the doctrine of merger, on which Toulmin v. Steere rested, can have any application in the present case.—p. 257.

WOOD, V.-C.—The case of White v. Hillacre is no doubt one of some complexity; but the report of the judgment in that case is not given in such a manner as to show upon what the learned judge rested his decision. . . . There the mortgagor of one property devised the equity of redemption to A., and A. having another estate of his own, mortgaged that estate to B., who afterwards got the two estates united—that is not an authority which can be relied on for the distinction attempted to be made by Mr. Amphlett (p. 515). . . . The question as to purchasers has not been so common; but in this case, where the equity of redemption has been split into three or four portions by different conveyances, the decision in Titley v. Davies is a clear authority. Titley, the purchaser, was there let in before Davies, who was a subsequent mortgagee of the same equity of redemption, and successive redemptions were decreed. Edwards v. Martin occasioned me some difficulty, because in that instance there were several purchasers of the equity of redemption, and one decree of foreclosure was made against them all, leaving them to come in at Chambers and apply with respect to their rights. Mr. Leach has searched for the decrees in both these cases. That of Titley v. Davies he finds corresponds with the report. In Edwards v. Martin, Titley v. Davies was not cited. Mr. Leach says that he has no doubt the decree in Edwards v. Martin was penned by the V.-C. himself; and it has considerable weight in that respect. But then the V.-C. had not Titley v. Davies before him. Mr. Leach says he remembers the case, and made a note at the time, that the decree did not fully declare the rights of the parties, but left it to them to work out their rights in Chambers.—p. 549. And see post, cols. 1904, 1905.

JAMES, L.J.—It seems to me that where a man has a legal right in property A., and an equity of redemption in property B. which is an insufficient security, and has no occasion, and never will have any occasion, to come to a Court of equity with respect to property A., the fact of the two properties being subject to two mortgages gives the Court no more power to take from him property A., than it has to take any other property belonging to him, for the purpose of satisfying the debt for which there is insufficient security. To suppose that that is what was laid down by Wood, V.-C., in Selby v. Pomfret, seems to me really to deal unfairly, if I may say so, with the language of the judge. The language of a judge is always to be construed with reference to the facts of the case before him. In that case, the learned judge was dealing with a case in which two estates had been reduced to the position of equities of redemption, and as the two estates had been reduced to the position of equities of redemption, the Court was right in saying that they must be consolidated. When a property is reduced to an equity of redemption, all the rights arising from that position follow; and the ground of the decision in Selby v. Pomfret was that the two properties at the time when the right of consolidation was supposed to have arisen had been reduced to the position of mere equities of redemption, having only an existence in the Court of Chancery.—p. 709.

KAY, J.—I think it does follow from that case (Mills v. Jennings), that the society have here no right to consolidate derived from the ordinary rule of equity, but the mortgage in this case contained a covenant to observe all the rules of the society. [His lordship read rule 31.] That rule expressly gives the society power to consolidate in every case, and the effect of the covenant is the same as if the words of the rule were repeated in the mortgage. Now, it appears that Andrews, if he did not, as was alleged, but denied actually, prepare this mortgage, at least acted as Fraser's [the mortgagor's] solicitor in the matter, and witnessed the execution of the mortgage. It is clear, therefore, that he had notice of its contents. Andrews therefore took his mortgage with notice of this express covenant, that the society should have the right to consolidate. That fact seems to take the case out of the rule established by Mills v. Jennings.—p. 642.

SELBORNE, L.C.—I cannot regard Tassell v. Smith (col. 1902) as an authority which ought to be followed on this occasion, great as was the eminence of the judges who decided it (p. 702). . . . The case of Baker v. Gray . . . in which the decree provided for consolidation against one of the defendants, and refused it as against the others, was different from the present. There the right to consolidate was claimed by the mortgagee, who was plaintiff in the suit, against all the defendants. It is clear that, in such a case, the decree might be, and ought to be, so made as to give the plaintiff what he was entitled to against each defendant.—p. 707.

LORD BLACKBURN.—And though I cannot doubt that the L.J.J. thought that the rule on which they acted in Tissell v. Smith was already established, and though it is reasonable to suppose that two judges who had such long and great experience in Courts of equity had grounds for so thinking, yet the discussion at your lordships' bar has convinced me that they made a mistake (p. 715). [His lordship dealt with the earlier cases and continued:] Notwithstanding the observations of Lord Hatherley in Bevor v. Luck, I must own that Alderson, B.'s judgment [in White v. Hillacre] has an appearance at least of good sense, and of furthering justice, or perhaps I should say of refusing to further injustice, that to my mind is very persuasive.—p. 718. LORD WATSON concurred.

LORD DAVEY.—Romer, J. . . . and the C.A. held that the case was governed by the decision . . . in Vint v. Padgett (col. 1902), which it was not competent for them to question, and accordingly decided in favour of the respondents. If Vint v. Padgett had been an isolated decision on a new point, then, notwithstanding the eminence of the learned judges who were parties to the decision, it may be that your lordships would probably be disposed to express your dissent from it . . . But it is obvious that the learned judges did not conceive themselves to be laying down new law. Knight Bruce, L.J. said that a long course and series of authorities binding on the Court precluded the possibility of their thinking that there was in the case more than one arguable question, if any—namely, as to the materiality of notice of a second mortgage to a transferee of prior mortgages—and Turner, L.J. said it was impossible to distinguish the case from Bovey v. Shipwith (supra, col. 1902)—a case decided in the reign of Charles II., to which I will presently refer—on any other ground than as to notice being material. In Tweedale v. Tweedale, decided in 1857, the year before Vint v. Padgett, the union of two mortgages made to different mortgagees took place after the assignment of the equity of redemption of both mortgaged properties. Lord Romilly held that the assignee could only stand in the position of the mortgagor, and be entitled to his rights only; and if the mortgagor could not have redeemed one property without the other, the assignee stood in no better or more favourable position, and was not entitled to redeem one without redeeming the other. Indeed, the contrary seems from the report to have been scarcely argued in that case . . . The old case of Bovey v. Shipwith, referred to by Turner, L.J., was a combined case of tacking (in the strict technical sense) and consolidation. There was—first, a mortgage with conveyance of the legal estate in two properties; secondly, an assignment of the equity of redemption in the two properties to a second mortgagee; thirdly, a third mortgage of one of the properties only without notice of the second mortgage. The third mortgagee bought and took a transfer of the first legal mortgage. It was held—first, that he might tack his equitable third mortgage to the first mortgage, so as to gain priority over the second mortgagee; and, secondly, that, having done so, he might consolidate his third mortgage (which was on one estate only) with the first mortgage on both estates and hold the two estates as against the second mortgagee until all that was due to him on both securities should be satisfied. Tilley v. Davies (supra, col. 1902), before Lord Hardwicke, may be distinguished on the ground that Tilley, the second equitable mortgagee of one of the estates, had before the assignment of the equity of redemption in another estate to Peyton acquired a right to redeem Shephard, the first mortgagee on both estates, and thereby consolidate the two mortgages. It is not, therefore, in my opinion, a direct authority on the present case, in which the consolidation has taken place by purchase and transfer, and not by the exercise of an existing right to redeem. In Selby v. Pomfret (supra, col. 1903) . . . although the Lord Chancellor [Lord Campbell] uses the word "tack," it is apparent from the facts of the case which he was dealing with that he meant tacking in the sense of consolidation. The case of Selby v. Pomfret may, no doubt, be distinguished from the present one on the ground that the assignment of the equity of redemption was by operation of law; but if there was no existing right of consolidation at the date of the bankruptcy the distinction seems to me to be unsubstantial, because the assignees of the bankrupt take his property subject only to existing equities. The statutory ius tertii of the creditors may be considered as entitled to more consideration. In Beeror v. Luck (col. 1902) Lord Hatherley held that a mortgagee of one property might, as against the assignee of the equity of redemption of another property, consolidate with his mortgage a mortgage from the same mortgagor on that other property of which he had taken a transfer after the date of the assignment of the equity of redemption of the second property only, overruling White v. Hillacre. The extent to which the right of consolidation was carried in this case was criticised by Lord Selborne in this House in Jennings v. Jordan, and so far as it held that mortgages on two properties could be consolidated against the assignee of the equity of redemption of one property only, where the union of the two mortgages did not take place until after the separation of the equities of redemption, Beeror v. Luck must be held to be overruled. It was so considered by Fry, J. in Harter v. Colman. This case is free from any such difficulty. At the time when redemption is sought all the mortgages are presently redeemable by the same person. Pledge, the plaintiff in the action, became by one transaction the assignee of the entire equity of redemption of all the mortgages. . . . The actual point decided in Jennings v. Jordan was that a mortgagee could not as against the assignee of an equity of redemption of one property consolidate with his original mortgage a mortgage on another property created by the same mortgagor after the assignment of the equity of redemption. The contrary had been maintained by the plaintiff on what was probably a misunderstanding of Tassell v. Smith (col. 1902). . . . Lord Selborne expressed himself in the following words: ". . . I have much more difficulty in following or satisfactorily explaining the principle of some other authorities, such as Beeror v. Luck, which have held (contrary to the decision of Alderson, B. in White v. Hillacre) that a mortgagee's right to consolidate as against the purchaser of the equity of redemption of property mortgaged to him is capable of being enlarged, after the date of that purchase, by a transfer to the mortgagee of other mortgages which were then in other hands, and with the equity of redemptions of which (if there were no consolidation) the purchaser would have nothing to do." I understand Lord Selborne to be here speaking only of the case in which the equities of redemption have become separated, and his observations have no reference to a case such as that now before the House, in which all the equities of redemption have been assigned to, and are now vested in, one person. I do not think that anything was said in this House in Jennings v. Jordan which throws any doubt or discredit on the decision in Vint v. Pudgett and the other cases to the same effect. At the time when this action was commenced the exact position contemplated by Lord Selborne had taken place—of all the mortgages being united in a single hand and redeemable by the same person. It appears from the facts of Jennings v. Jordan, stated in 49 L. J. Ch. 309; 13 Ch. D. 639, that the union of the mortgages which Jennings was held entitled to consolidate did not take place until after the settlement of the equity of redemption under which the respondent Jordan claimed. But, in my opinion, no reliance can be placed on that circumstance, as the facts show that it was a case of successive equities of redemption—one mortgage being on property A., and the other on property A. and B.—and not of consolidation simply. I mention this to avoid misapprehension.—pp. 450—454.

KAY, J.—There can be no doubt that a mortgagee, after his debt is paid off, is in a fiduciary position towards the mortgagor with respect to the satisfied security. This was decided in Cholmondeley v. Clinton, where Sir T. Plumer says there is an implied trust "to surrender the estate to the person entitled to demand it"; and the doctrine has always since been recognised. WESTBURY, L.C.—In the former case between the parties to the present record, the House of Lords decided that the release dated October 5, 1855, which had been obtained by John Sadleir from the appellant, Mr. Eyre, by a gross fraud, was void as between Eyre and Sadleir, and that it had no operation in favour of the London and County Bank, by estopping Mr. Eyre from claiming the benefit of his security in priority to that of the bank. The M.R. appears to have thought that the decree made by him in the present case was a mere consequence of that decision, and that the plaintiff, Mr. Eyre, had a right to follow into the hands of the bank money paid to the bank by Sadleir, because that money was raised on the security of one of the estates charged with Mr. Eyre's prior incumbrance, although at the time when such money was borrowed by Sadleir and paid over to the bank the latter had no notice whatever of the fraud that had been practised on Mr. Eyre. No such consequence flows from the decision of the House of Lords or the principles on which it was founded. That House had not to consider the effect of any dealing subsequent to and on the faith of the release between Sadleir and a junction for valuable consideration without notice.—p. 656.

LORD WENSLEYDALE—Noel v. Bewley . . . appears, as I have said, to have weighed much with the L.C. of Ireland in inducing him to decide against the appellant, and undoubtedly it would, if properly decided, justify this decree. . . . The V.-C. then declared that the law was, that if a person had conveyed a defective title, and afterwards acquired a good one, the covenant would render that good title available to make the conveyance effectual. This, no doubt, was true, if the person had agreed to sell and convey an estate absolutely in the first instance; then, if he had no title at the time of the contract, and afterwards acquired one, he would be bound to make good his contract, and to convey it; but if he never covenanted absolutely to convey, but only conditionally, and the condition was never fulfilled, he was under no such obligation. It was clearly a mistaken application on the part of the V.-C. of an established rule to a case to which it was not applicable, and in my judgment the case was on that account wrongly decided, and is of no authority.—p. 398.

HALL, V.-C.—It has been submitted that the loss of the deed was an innocent one on the part of the defendants, and that under such circumstances no indemnity could be required. I do not find that that is the result of the authorities. There may be some peculiarity in the settled practice of the Court in respect to the loss of title deeds as between mortgagor and mortgagee, making the case not exactly that of an ordinary liability of a bailee ; but it seems to me, looking at the authorities, that a mortgagor is, under such circumstances as exist in the present case, entitled to an indemnity. That seems to me to be a fair result of all the cases which have been referred to, and therefore the plaintiff was right in claiming an indemnity, and he was also, I think, right upon the decision of Midleton (Lord) v. Eliot in coming to the Court to have the matter sifted and inquired into, for the purpose of establishing his title and having it made clear, so that he might be able to deal with the property in future.—p. 403.

KEKEWICH, J.—It may be that the contract means that the option of purchase shall not be exercisable after repayment of principal and interest. If the contract means this, the case would be brought within the doctrine laid down by Buckley, J. in Lisle v. Reeve : but in the first place, I do not myself think that this is the true meaning of the contract ; and secondly, having regard to what was said by the C. A. in the same case of Lisle v. Reeve, Buckley, J.'s doctrine cannot be regarded as sound.—p. 690.

LOPES, L.J.—It was decided by Pearce v. Morris that a person having a partial interest in the equity of redemption is entitled to redeem the whole property, saving the rights of the other persons interested. It was attempted to distinguish that case on the ground that here the mortgagee is in possession, and would after transferring the security be liable to account for future rents. I agree with Cotton, L.J., that this continued liability exists only where the transfer is made voluntarily, and not where it is made under an order of the Court.—p. 437.

LORD CAMPBELL.—There it did not appear that the representative of the administrator might not have a claim on the estate equal to the value of the equity of redemption; he was no party before the Court, and the report in Freeman says the Court decreed the benefit of redemption to the executor of the first administrator, who had aliened the whole estate in law of the term, and was not possessed in auter droit of any part of the interest thereof, but in his own right; so that it seems to have been taken that the executor of the administrator, when a re-conveyance was executed to him, would not be accountable to the administrator de bonis non. But whether such executor must convey to the administrator de bonis non, I do not find that Lord Nottingham intimates any opinion that a bill to redeem may not be maintained by the administrator de bonis non, against the mortgagee.—p. 249.

KEKEWICH, J.—That case [Brown v. Cole] decides that the mortgagor cannot, before the time limited for payment to the mortgagee expires, either insist on acceptance of a tender of the mortgage money or take proceedings to redeem. But that is because during that time the mortgage must remain as a security for the money advanced, and it is not competent for the mortgagee or the mortgagor to disturb that relation. But if the mortgagee himself disturbs that relation, as he has done here, though he has been led into doing so by the mortgagor absconding, he cannot insist on notice to pay off being served upon him.—p. 543.

CROMPTON, J.—If the ground of the decision in Walker v. Giles can only be supported, if at all, on the ground pointed out by Lord Wensleydale in Pinhorn v. Souster." V. WILLIAMS, J.—In West v. Fritche the interest was not paid as rent, and yet the Court held there was a tenancy; but the decision was based entirely on occupation by one who had executed a deed continuing an attornment clause. Here the suggested tenancy is by one who has not executed any attornment clause, and who has merely occupied and paid interest.—p. 377.

BACON, C.J.—As to Hampson v. Fellows . . . I have not the facts so clearly before me that I can express any opinion upon it. If the bill therealleged a case of fraud, a case of agreement between the parties not carried out by the deed, a demurrer to such bill might well be allowed, but, on the cause coming on to be heard, the alleged fraud would have to be investigated. Such a case has no application whatever to the case before me, and still less has Walker v. Giles (supra, col. 1917).—p. 133.

Jackson, Ex parte, Bowes, In re (1880) 14 Ch. D. 725; 43 L. T. 272; 29 W. R. 253.—C.A.
BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Now Morton v. Woods has been referred to on behalf of the respondents, and the view presented by their counsel, as I understand it, is this: that it is quite immaterial what the amount of rent is which you place upon the premises by an attornment clause; you are at liberty to make it as unreal as you choose, to cover the whole principal and interest, if you think fit, and the Court will not interfere with it. But Morton v. Woods does not decide that. It decides that, as a general rule, an attornment clause is not in itself unlawful, provided it is real. The rent need not be limited to the amount of interest from time to time becoming due upon the mortgage debt. It is not introduced for that purpose alone, although it is one way of securing the interest. The measure of the real rent is the lettable value of the property, not the amount of the mortgage debt. In Morton v. Woods there was no suggestion that the rent fixed by the attornment clause was other than the real and proper rent, and, as I read the case, all that the Court decided was the general principle that effect will be given to attornment clauses when they are real and carry out the true intention of the parties to them, so far as that intention is limited to creating the relation of landlord and tenant in the proper sense.—p. 738.

Morton v. Woods, explained and followed.

Pannett, Ex parte, Kitchin, In re (1880) 16 Ch. D. 226; 50 L. J. Ch. 212; 44 L. T. 226; 29 W. R. 129.—C.A. And see post, col. 1922.

LUSH, L.J.—I would observe that Morton v. Woods governs the present case entirely, unless there is some distinction to be found on the ground that here the mortgagor had already attorned and agreed to stand in the relation of tenant to the first mortgagees. Morton v. Woods, I may also say, is supported by Stockton Iron Furnace Co., In re (post, col. 1920), in this Court, the decision in which is exactly on the same ground and to the same effect upon both points. Now, is there any distinction? Does the fact that the mortgagor had already agreed to stand in the relation of tenant to a first mortgagee disqualify him from creating the same relationship between himself and a second mortgagee? I cannot imagine any principle of law which would prevent a person, if he chooses to do so, from undertaking that relationship to two distinct persons. The object of each attornment is perfectly clear. It is to secure the interest payable on the mortgage debt, and if there is no distinction on that ground, then there is no distinction whatever between the present case and Morton v. Woods or Stockton Iron Furnace Co., In re.—p. 235.

Threlfall, In re, Queen's Benefit Building Society, Ex parte (1880) 16 Ch. D. 274; 50 L. J. Ch. 318; 44 L. T. 74; 29 W. R. 128.—C.A.

LUSH, L.J.—Although in Morton v. Woods the expression "tenancy at will" was used by some of the judges while professing to describe the relation between the parties, yet it must not be taken as intended to be an exact legal definition of it, particularly when we consider the facts and arguments before them. In all cases the words of the judgment must be considered with reference to the arguments adduced. I am rather glad to see that I did not myself describe the tenancy as a tenancy at will. But the argument in that case was that the attornment was for ten years, and if so, void because not made by deed; and therefore the judges said that it was a tenancy at will, meaning a tenancy for an indefinite term not to exceed ten years, determinable at the will of the landlord. That is precisely like this case, a yearly tenancy with an express proviso for the determination of that tenancy at any time by will of the lessor.—p. 282.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—To my mind the difference between this case and Williams, Ex parte, is this, that in Williams, Ex parte, it was found, and, if I may add my concurrence to that case, it was rightly found, that the intention and object of the arrangement there was to commit what was called a fraud upon the bankruptcy law, by entering into stipulations which were not to be enforced except in the event of bankruptcy. Here, although no doubt the parties did not contemplate the mortgagees putting their right to the rent into operation, yet if there had been no liquidation the bankers would have made the distress which they have made, if for any other reason they had thought that their balance was ill-secured.—p. 358.

BRETT, L.J.—Therefore, what we have to consider is this (and this is the real meaning of Williams, Ex parte)—at the time when the contract was made, was it made for the purpose of its being acted upon between the parties, whether there should be a bankruptcy or not, or, although in terms it appears to be made between the parties with the intention that it should be acted upon whether there is a bankruptcy or not, were their minds really then fixed upon this, that it was to be acted upon only if there should be a bankruptcy? In other words, they must have had bankruptcy in their contemplation at the time of making the contract, they must have contemplated evading or attempting to evade the fair distribution of the mortgagor's property in case of his bankruptcy. That seems to me to be the true proposition, and the true principle of law which is laid down in Williams, Ex parte. . . Now, Williams, Ex parte, and the other cases on the subject, afford some guidance as to what state of facts will bring a case within the principle, but they do not exclude other states of facts. Other facts may arise which would have the same effect, although they may not be the same as the facts of Williams, Ex parte. But Williams, Ex parte, and Jackson, Ex parte, show that, where the rent reserved, or that which is called rent, is so abnormal that you can gather from it alone that the parties must have known and intended that it should not be paid as a rent, that it never could be paid as a rent or distrained for as a rent (for there never could in ordinary contemplation be anything for which such an absurd amount could be realised), when you find such a state of facts, you infer from it (there being nothing to countervail it) that the parties never intended that the stipulation should be acted upon as fixing a rent to be paid by the one or to be distrained for by the other, that it was not a stipulation as to rent at all, but was merely a fiction, and that what was intended was only that, in case of the bankruptcy of the mortgagor the mortgagee should have the right to seize upon the goods which were then on the premises, not to seize on them if there were no bankruptcy, but only to seize upon them in case of bankruptcy. It seems to me that that is the true meaning of Williams, Ex parte, because in the Stockton Case, James, L.J., who had been a party to deciding Williams, Ex parte, seeing that words had then been used which might not properly and truly express the principle, that a "fair rent" had been spoken of, changes his proposition and says (p. 356), that the inference is to be drawn, not from what you might call a fair or an unfair rent, but from the rent being such an absurd amount as to show that an evasion of the bankruptcy laws was intended. It is true that Baggallay, L.J., in the subsequent case of Jackson, Ex parte, did use some expressions which would seem to take the proposition back to the terms used in Williams, Ex parte; but I do not think that he intended to alter the proposition as it was laid down in the Stockton Case, and certainly the other judges who sat with him used words which show that they intended to lay down the proposition, not exactly in the terms used in Williams, Ex parte, but rather in those which James, L.J. used in the Stockton Case, and which have been adopted by the M.R. and the other judges who have sat in this Court.—p. 459.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—A share is a chose in action. The certificates are merely evidence of title, and whatever may be the result of the deposit of a bearer bond, such as that which Sir G. Jessel dealt with in Carter v. Wake, I think I cannot treat the plaintiff as a mere pledgee. The deposit of the certificate by way of security for the debt which is admitted seems to me to amount to an equitable mortgage . . . The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment substantially in the form which would be given if, instead of certificates for shares, the documents had been title deeds of real estate or a policy of assurance.—Seton on Judgments (5th ed.) p. 1701.—p. 563.

KEKEWICH, J.—Fry, J., in Woolley v. Colman, a case which stands almost alone, and in which the conduct of the sale was allowed to the mortgagor, required him to give security for 150% to meet the costs of the sale; but North, J., in Davies v. Wright, expressed a different view from that, saying, "I do not, however, see any reason why a mortgagor who is going to sell himself, should give security for the costs of the sale. He will have to pay the costs, and the mortgagee's security will not be affected." That, no doubt, to a certain extent is true. . . . I think the mortgagor must provide 100% for the costs of the sale and other proper costs, p. 115.

STIRLING, J.—That was a case of a much wider power than that conferred by the Act [Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 21, sub-s. 2]. . . . First of all, it applies to any sale purporting to have been made in pursuance of the power in that behalf, and next it provides that a purchaser under such a sale shall not be bound to inquire whether the power has arisen, or as to the propriety or expediency of the sale, and, notwithstanding any irregularity, the purchaser shall be protected; and thirdly, the mortgagor's remedy is in damages only. In that case the question arose not between a vendor and a purchaser, but between a purchaser and a mortgagor and his assign; and Sir G. Jessel, M.R. held that the purchaser had a good title, even though the whole of the mortgage-money had been paid when the power was purported to be exercised. . . . The M.R. did not decide that the purchaser could not have taken an objection or inquired whether the power had become exercisable.—p. 550.

BOWEN, L.J.—In *Parkinson v. COTTON, L.J.—I quite adhere to the rule as laid down in Cockburn v. Edwards, that if a solicitor lends money to his client, he must take from him a security on that advance in the ordinary terms, unless he points out to his client how far the terms on which he is willing to lend the money differ from those which are usually required by persons lending money; and if the transaction is ever impeached by the client to whom he lends the money, he must, in order to support it, show that he has given such advice to his client about the transaction as he would have given to a client borrowing money from a third party, or as any other solicitor not personally interested in the transaction would have given to the client. But this is a transaction entirely different from an ordinary loan of money, it is a transaction in which the question is, what terms can the client make with the solicitor? If there had been any real question whether Mr. Pooley understood the terms of this equitable security, the case would have been very different from that which we have to consider. Here, there being this note outstanding, which would become payable on the 11th July, power is given to the solicitor who holds the note, and who could instantly have sued, to sell and realise the security which he held. There is also a great difference between this case and Cockburn v. Edwards as regards the nature of the property. There the mortgage was on property as to which we know how it is usually dealt with. Here the property was of a very peculiar character. It was an interest in a railway burdened with a heavy debenture debt—the concern had previously become bankrupt, and, apparently, the interest of Mr. Pooley, if worth anything, was worth very little. Therefore it might be very reasonable that this not being an ordinary transaction there should be such a power as is here given to Mr. Kaye, Mr. Pooley not suggesting, as, indeed, he hardly could have done, that he did not understand the power of sale, though he probably did not know what the ordinary power of sale in an ordinary mortgage is. Then it is also to be observed that in an ordinary mortgage the terms usually are that the power of sale shall not be exercised unless the principal is wholly or in part unpaid six months after notice, or unless interest is in arrear for three months. Now, at the time when this power of sale was exercised, there really was three months' interest in arrear, because the 16l. 17s. 10d. was the interest on the debt due down to the 11th of July, and that had been in arrear for at least three months at the time this sale took place. In Cockburn v. Edwards the Court inquired whether the interest was in arrear, and only held the solicitor liable for the exercise of the power of sale because on the evidence before them they came to the conclusion that in fact he had been paid all the interest which was due by the receipt of rents which he had appropriated to payment of interest, so that the ordinary form of a power of sale would not have allowed the sale which in fact was made by him.—p. 122.

- NORTH, J.—The law as to the position of a mortgagee exercising a power of sale is, in my opinion, correctly laid down by Kay, J., in Warner v. Jacob. The language of Stuart, V.-C. in Robertson v. Norris no doubt goes considerably further in treating the mortgagee as a trustee; but that language goes beyond anything to be found in the cases relied upon as authorities for it, as was pointed out by the C. A. in the recent case of Nash v. Eads (25 Sol. J. 95).—p. 860.

- LINDLEY, J.—The V.-C. begins his judgment by referring to Warner v. Jacob and Farrar v. Farrars, Ltd., which contain the principles applicable to this case, and then he says: "Now in this case it is not suggested that the mortgagee did not act bona fide; and it is not suggested that there was any corruption or collusion on their part, or that the sale itself was at an under-value so gross as to be in itself evidence of fraud." If that is so, and I believe every word of it, upon what ground can the sale be set aside? He was led, and I think a little misled, by some language I used in Farrar v. Farrars, Ltd.. I there said: "If in exercise of his power he"—that is, the mortgagee—"acts bona fide and takes reasonable precautions to obtain a proper price, the mortgagor has no redress, even though more might have been obtained for the property if the sale had been postponed." Now the V.-C. has come to the conclusion that reasonable precautions to obtain a proper price were not used. I find from my colleagues who took part in the judgment, and who approved of it, that the reason why those words were added was this: a mortgagee is not a trustee of a power of sale for the mortgagor at all; his right is to look after himself first. But he is not at liberty to look after his own interests alone, and it is not right or proper, or legal, for him, either fraudulently or wilfully or recklessly, to sacrifice the property of the mortgagor—that is all. . . . With reference to . . . Van Horne v. Fonda. all I can say is this: . . . I do not know how far the law of America and the law of England are allied in these matters. I do happen to know this—that, according to the law of America, it is much easier for one co-owner of real property to get a lien on the whole than it is in this country. Whether that affected the learned judge's view I do not know; but I am not prepared on the authority of that case to say that Dodson could be compelled, to account for the profit he may have made out of this sale.—p. 468.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—In that case [Martinson v. Clowes, col. 1931] the solicitor had the conduct of the sale (p. 368). The C. A. in Farrar v. Farrars, Ltd. says this in the judgment of the present M.R.: "A mortgagee with a power of sale, though often called a trustee, is in a very different position from a trustee for sale. A mortgagee is under obligations to the mortgagor, but he has rights of his own which he is entitled to exercise adversely to the mortgagor. A trustee for sale has no business to place himself in such a position as to give rise to a conflict of interest and duty. But every mortgage confers upon the mortgagee the right to realise his security and to find a purchaser if he can, and if in exercise of his power he acts bona fide and takes reasonable precautions to obtain a proper price, the mortgagor has no redress, even although more might have been obtained for the property if the sale had been postponed." Subsequently to that, in the H. L., the law is laid down even more strongly and more clearly by Lord Herschell in Kennedy v. De Trafford, where he says: "I am myself disposed to think that if a mortgagee in exercising his power of sale exercises it in good faith, without any intention of dealing unfairly by his mortgagor, it would be very difficult indeed, if not impossible, to establish that he has been guilty of any breach of duty towards the mortgagor." And he says further: "It is very difficult to define exhaustively all that would be included in the words 'good faith,' but I think it would be unreasonable to require the mortgagee to do more than exercise his power of sale in that fashion." Lord Macnaghten says this: "If a mortgagee selling under his power of sale in his mortgage takes pains to comply with the provisions of that power and acts in good faith, I do not think his conduct in regard to the sale can be impeached."—p. 369.

JESSEL, M.R.—Then, the argument being exhausted—or for lack of argument recourse is had to authority, and three cases have been cited. All I can say is, I do not understand them . . . The law had been perfectly well settled on all these points many many years before those cases were heard or thought of, and I do not think the judges who decided those cases intended to do more than to follow the rule of law already laid down, they did not intend to lay down new law.—p. 574.

[WOOD, V.-C., says, in Bates v. Johnson, "If a second and a third mortgagee are both equally desirous of redeeming the first, the first mortgagee has it in his power, if he be so minded, to give the preference to which of the two he pleases.”]

COTTON, L.J.—I should doubt that very much: the second mortgagee is prior to the third.—p. 960.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Another argument was addressed to us based upon Peacock v. Burt and that class of cases, which have established the law as stated by Cotton, L.J.: but in my opinion they are cases which certainly ought not to be extended. Peacock v. Burt looks very like a conspiracy between the first and third mortgagees to cheat the second, which cannot be right. That, however, is the aspect which many of the old cases on the subject bear; still, I am not at liberty to question those decisions, for although they are opposed to my ideas of morality, they are nevertheless law. However, I am not going to make them the pretext for doing general wrong.—p. 963.

JESSEL, M.R. discussed Locking v. Parker and approved of Kirkwood v. Thompson.—p. 296.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The V.-C. fully recognised the law to be as it has just been stated by the M.R., but he founded his decision on certain passages which he found in the judgment of James, L.J., in Locking v. Parker; however, he does not seem to have adverted to the distinction that in that case the sale had been exercised as regards a sufficient portion of the estate to pay off the amount of principal money and interest before the period of twenty years had elapsed, and therefore before the time had arrived when the right of the mortgage was barred. What the L.J. said is this:—“In that case when the estate has been sold, there is an express trust of the surplus money for the mortgagor. If, then, there had been any allegation in this bill, or any evidence that there were any surplus moneys, the bill might have been sustained for those surplus moneys, but that is not the frame and intention of the bill.” But dicta and observations of this kind made by a judge in the course of a judgment must be read with reference to the particular circumstances of the case before him. In that case had there been any surplus moneys after satisfying the principal money and interest due, the mortgagees would doubtless have had to account, because the trust had arisen before the estate was barred, but the distinction between that case and the present is this, that in the present case the sale did not take place until after the estate had been barred.—p. 297.

KAY, J.—But then I was referred to cases, of which I will mention one or two, to show that a mortgagee selling under that power became affected with an express trust. The first case I will notice was Tanner v. Heard. There I observe that the M.R., in his judgment, carefully puts the case, not on the ground of the defendant being mortgagee, but on a separate and distinct ground. He says, “The question in this case is as to costs, which are claimed by both sides.” It was only a question of costs. Then he says, “I am of opinion that this is not a case in which the principles which obtain in a suit between mortgagees are applicable; I think it distinguishable. It is a case of this description: The defendant was first mortgagee of a ship, the plaintiff was the second. The defendant, with the sanction and authority of the plaintiff, sold it at Amsterdam, and received the proceeds of the sale. Being entitled, in the first place, to the amount due on his mortgage and the expenses of the sale of the ship, and, there being a surplus, he was bound to account to the plaintiff in the character of trustee.” The M.R., if I understand him, carefully distinguishes the case from the ordinary case of a mortgagee selling, and holds that, because the ship was sold by arrangement between the two who were, both of them, interested in the property, the one who received the money was trustee of the surplus for the other. That, therefore, is no authority that a mortgagee selling a ship under the statutory power is a trustee.—p. 634. See judgment at length.

NORTH, J.—In Coleman v. Llewellyn it was pointed out by the C. A. that the proviso which was there inserted in the order must have been put in for some special reason by the judge, which makes a broad distinction between that case and Jenner-Fust v. Needham, which lays down the general rule that in ordinary cases where the receiver receives rents between the date of the certificate and the day fixed for redemption, those rents must be taken into account, and a further time allowed for redemption.—p. 367.

JESSEL, M.R.—It is very difficult to find authorities exactly in point. I recollect one very strongly in point. It was Fowler v. Wyatt, which was a suit to set aside a release of an equity of redemption and to redeem. Fowler became bankrupt. He had two assignees, one the trade assignee, and the other the official assignee.

The official assignee, being afraid of the cost of the litigation, declined to join as plaintiff, and the trade assignee alone revived. That was objected to first at the Rolls, where the M.R. overruled the objection on the ground that one of two trustees acting in bankruptcy could maintain a suit to redeem. It was appealed to Lord Cranworth, then L.C., who affirmed the decision, and the suit afterwards came on for hearing. . . . Two trustees there [Adams v. Paynter] filed a bill to foreclose. It was objected that the third trustee had not been discharged and should have joined them. How?
The objection was that he was not made a party, and the objection was allowed, and he was made a party as defendant. They did not add plaintiffs in those days, and therefore that was considered sufficient. And on general principles I cannot see why this should not be done.—p. 126.

COTTON, L.J.—Under Order XVI. rule 7 (Ord.
XVI. r. 8), (1883), trustees may, both as plaintiffs and defendants, sufficiently represent the trust estate, without any of the parties ben-eficially interested being before the Court, with power, nevertheless, for the Court or a judge to direct any of such last-mentioned persons to be made parties. But this rule is in substance a repetition of rule 9, sect. 42, of the Chancery Act, 1852; and it was argued that, in suits relating to mortgagees, it had been held, as in Goldsmid
v. Stonehewer, that trustees did not sufficiently represent their adult cestuis que trust unless it was probable that the trustee, from being executor or otherwise, had funds in hand sufficient to enable him to redeem. But that case was a suit for foreclosure, in which the trustee was a defendant whom the plaintiff sought to foreclose; and there is a reason in such a case for not giving the plaintiff the relief he seeks unless he brings before the Court all those interested in the equity of redemption who may probably have the means of redeeming the mortgage. Here the plaintiff-trustee is seeking to redeem, and the dismissal of his bill will be effectual in favour of the defendant Jennings, so as to prevent any further proceedings for redemption in respect of the property vested in the plaintiff as trustee.—p. 649.

JESSEL, M.R.—Horlock v. Smith was decided in 1844, before the order under which “just allowances” are now imported into every decree directing accounts. This case is not quite correctly stated in Seton [3rd ed., p. 381] for the decision clearly intimates that if “just allowances” had been mentioned in the decree the costs of the ejectment by the mortgagee, that is, the costs incurred by her in enforcing and in giving effect to her security, would have been allowed. Mr. Wigram, in his argument, states the law to be, that in an account between mortgagor and mortgagee, the mortgagee is entitled to all costs incurred in fairly and reasonably maintaining his title at law; and in support of that proposition he cites Dryden v. Frost and Ellison v. Wright (supra). To that statement of the law Knight Bruce, V.-C. in reality assents, but under the particular circumstances of the case he declined to give the mortgagee the costs.—p. 190.

COTTON, L.J.—As regards the authorities on this class of costs, I prefer Ellison v. Wright to Lewis v. John and Merriman v. Bonney, so far as the latter two cases throw doubt upon the first; and I am glad to find that in the note to Seton on Decrees [4th ed., p. 1059] the law is laid down in terms which are, I think, justified by the authorities:—“Both in foreclosure and redemption actions the mortgagee is entitled to the costs of suit, and also to all costs properly incurred by him in reference to the mortgaged property for its protection or preservation, recovery of the mortgage money, or otherwise relating to questions between him and the mortgagor, and to add the amount to the sum due to him on his security.”—p. 593.

JAMES, L.J.—I think the registrar was right, and I concur in his conclusion that the costs of the action should be deducted from the value of the bank's security. It is said that this conclusion is adverse to the decision in Stephens, Ex parte, but the report of that case is contained in a very few lines; no facts are stated, and no argument and no reasons are given for the judgment. It cannot, therefore, have any weight as an authority. If necessary, I am prepared to say that I cannot follow it, for I cannot understand the principle on which it is founded. A mortgagee is entitled to deduct from the value of his security that which is in the nature of salvage money, his reasonable expenses of defending his title.—p. 65.

COTTON, L.J.—Clapham v. Andrews has been referred to, where there were two mortgages by one mortgagor, who was entitled under the provisions of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to redeem the mortgaged properties separately. The learned judge thought the proper course was to make the whole of the costs chargeable against each estate. In my opinion, that view is erroneous, as it really amounts to a consolidation as regards costs, although by legislative enactment the mortgagor is allowed to redeem separately.—p. 636. BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ. concurred.

BACON, V.-C.—In Macrae v. Ellerton, Sir J. Stuart seems to have thought that there were circumstances which justified a departure from the general rule. It is very likely that if the same state of circumstances should arise again which existed there, the Court would pronounce exactly the same judgment as was delivered by the V.-C. But that decision, invading, as it was supposed to do the settled rule of the Court, was brought under the review successively of the M.R., Kindersley, V.-C. and the L.C. Not a shadow of doubt existed in the minds of any of the learned judges as to what the guiding principle of the Court in dealing with costs in cases of this kind is. The costs of a mortgagee are the costs of realising his security. He takes the costs of realising his security because he holds the property as a security for his debt; how upon principle the heir-at-law or devisee can interfere, I am at a loss to understand. The property is the property of the pledgee and the Court can take nothing from the estate until the mortgagee's claim is satisfied.—p. 144.

Ford v. Chesterfield (Earl) (1856) 21 Beav. 426. ROMILLY, M.R.—Kenebel v. Scafton is referred to as an authority for the proposition, that the costs of all the incumbrances are to be first paid. I am of opinion that it is no authority for that purpose. [His lordship then referred to Hepworth v. Heslop and continued:] I refer to that case for the purpose of showing that it is a mistake to suppose, that Kenebel v. Scafton establishes such a proposition as that which Mr. Daniell in his book [Daniell's Pract. (1st ed., vol. iii. pp. 18—62)] seems to have considered. Certainly that has not been the practice, as far as I am aware, either during my own practice at the bar or since I have had to administer justice from this seat. With respect to my decision in Armstrong v. Storer, it was distinct from, and is perfectly reconcilable with, Hepworth v. Heslop. In that case, the mortgagee might, if he had pleased, have enforced his mortgage; but, instead of that, he filed a bill for the administration of the estate. The consequence, I said, was, that as he had exercised his option and adopted that course, he must be held to have done so, knowing the usual rules of the Court, and that the costs of the administration of an estate must be paid in the first instance and before he was entitled to be paid his mortgage debt.—pp. 428, 429.

CHATTERTON, V.-C.—That case (*Hilliard v. As regards Cope v. Breslin, it was there clearly shown that the mortgagees in that case deliberately consented to the sale in this Court; that they did so after consideration and discussion; and that a speedy sale was a matter of great importance to, and for the benefit of, all parties interested. It was also shown that the sale of the mortgaged premises together with the furniture brought in more than would have been realised if premises and furniture had been sold separately.—pp. 472, 473.

DR. LUSHINGTON.—With due respect to the judges who decided that case, I do not consider that it is necessary for me to dissect that judgment; but I decline to be bound by it, because it is a single case; because I know, upon inquiry, that it has been doubted by high authority; because it appears to me not reconcilable with other principles laid down at common law; and lastly, because it is directly against Hay v. Le Neve (2 Shaw's Scotch Appeals, 405), and the ordinary practice of the Court of Admiralty; for if, by the practice of the Court of Admiralty, the owner of a delinquent ship, where both ships are to blame, may recover one-half of his loss, a fortiori the innocent owner of the cargo cannot be deprived of a like remedy.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This case (Thorogood v. Bryan) was decided as long ago as 1849, and has been followed in some other cases; but though it was early subjected to adverse criticism, it has never come for revision before a Court of appeal until the present occasion. [After stating the conclusion arrived at in that case he continued:] It is necessary to examine carefully the reasoning by which this conclusion was arrived at. Coltman, J. said, "It appears to me that, having trusted the party by selecting the particular conveyance, the plaintiff has so far identified himself with the owner and her servants, that if any injury results from their negligence, he must be considered a party to it. In other words, the passenger is so far identified with the carriage in which he is travelling, that want of care of the driver will be a defence to the driver of the carriage which directly caused the injury." Maule J. and Vaughan Williams, J. also dwelt upon this view of the identification of the passenger with the driver of the vehicle in which he is being carried. The former thus expressed himself: "I incline to think that, for this purpose, the deceased must be considered as identified with the driver of the omnibus in which he voluntarily became a passenger, and that the negligence of the driver was the negligence of the deceased." Vaughan Williams, J. said, "I think the passenger must for this purpose be considered as identified with the person having the management of the omnibus he was conveyed by."

With the utmost respect for these eminent judges, I must say that I am unable to comprehend this doctrine of identification upon which they lay so much stress. In what sense is the passenger by a public stage coach, because he avails himself of the accommodation afforded by it, identified with the driver? The learned judges manifestly do not mean to suggest (though some of the language used would seem to bear that construction) that the passenger is so far identified with the driver that the negligence of the latter would render the former liable to third persons injured by it. I presume that they did not even mean that the identification is so complete as to prevent the passenger from recovering against the driver's master; though if "negligence of the owner's servants is to be considered negligence of the passenger," or if he "must be considered a party to their negligence," it is not easy to see why it should not be a bar to such an action. In short, as far as I can see, the identification appears to be effective only to the extent of enabling another person whose servants have been guilty of negligence to defend himself by the allegation of contributory negligence on the part of the person injured. But the very question that had to be determined was, whether the contributory negligence of the driver of the vehicle was a defence as against the passenger when suing another wrongdoer. To say that it is a defence because the passenger is identified with the driver appears to me to beg the question, when it is not suggested that the identification results from any recognised principles of law, or has any other effect than to furnish that defence, the validity of which was the very point in issue. Two persons may no doubt be so bound together by the legal relation in which they stand to each other, that the acts of one may be regarded by the law as the acts of the other. But the relation between the passenger in a public vehicle, and the driver of it, certainly is not such as to fall within any of the recognised categories in which the act of one man is treated in law as the act of another.

I pass now to the other reasons given for the judgment in Thorogood v. Bryan. Maule, J. says: "On the part of the plaintiff it is suggested that a passenger in a public conveyance has no control over the driver. But I think that cannot with propriety be said. He selects the conveyance. He enters into a contract with the owner, whom by his servant the driver, he employs to drive him. If he is dissatisfied with the mode of conveyance, he is not obliged to avail himself of it. But, as regards the present plaintiff, he is not altogether without fault; he chose his own conveyance, and must take the consequences of any default on the part of the driver whom he thought fit to trust."

I confess I cannot concur in this reasoning. I do not think it well founded either in law or in fact. What kind of control has the passenger over the driver which would make it reasonable to hold the former affected by the negligence of the latter? And is it any more reasonable to hold him so affected because he chose the mode of conveyance—that is to say, drove in an omnibus rather than walked, or took the first omnibus that passed him instead of waiting for another? And when it is attempted to apply this reasoning to passengers travelling in steamships or on railways the unreasonableness of such a doctrine is even more glaring.

The only other reason given is contained in the judgment of Creswell, J. in these words: "If the driver of the omnibus the deceased was in had by his negligence or want of due care and skill contributed to an injury from a collision, his master clearly could maintain no action. And I must confess I see no reason why a passenger who employs the driver to convey him stands in any better position." Surely, with deference, the reason for the difference lies on the very surface. If the master in such a case could maintain no action, it is because there existed between him and the driver the relation of master and servant. It is clear that if his driver's negligence alone had caused the collision, he would have been liable to an action for the injury resulting from it to third parties. The learned judge would, I imagine, in that case have seen a reason why a passenger in the omnibus stood in a better position than the master of the driver. I have now dealt with all the reasons on which the judgment in Thorogood v. Bryan was founded, and I entirely agree with the

I will not detain your lordships further on this part of the case, beyond saying that I concur with the judgments of the learned judges in the Court below, and specially with the very exhaustive judgment of the M.R., Lord Esher.

It was suggested, in the course of the argument, that Thorogood v. Bryan might be supported on the ground that the allegation that the negligence which caused the injury was the defendant's was not proved, inasmuch as it was the defendant's negligence in conjunction with that of the driver of the other omnibus. It may be that, as a pleading point, this would have been good. It is not necessary to express an opinion whether it would or not. I do not think it would have been a defence on the merits if the facts had been properly averred. If, by a collision between two vehicles, a person unconnected with either vehicle were injured, the owner of neither vehicle, when sued, could maintain as a defence, "I am not guilty, because but for the negligence of another person the accident would not have happened." And I do not see how this defence is any more available as against a person being carried in one of the vehicles, unless the reasoning in Thorogood v. Bryan be well founded.—pp. 67, 68, 69, 70.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—The case is somewhat like that of Clayards v. Dethick, where a cabman attempted to bring his horse out of his mews across the outlet of which a trench had been dug by the commissioners of sewers, and in doing so, the horse fell into the trench and was killed, and it was decided that the fact that the cabman incurred some danger in his attempt did not disentitle him to recover. I may observe, however, that I do not think that that case was rightly decided, for it is not because the plaintiff chose to incur a risk that he behaved reasonably in the way he acted. . . . In Hobbs v. L. & S. W. Ry. (post) it was said that the damage to the wife was a secondary consequence of the breach of contract and too remote; and, by way of illustration, the case was given of a person walking home in the dark who took a false step which resulted in a fall and a broken limb: but I must say I do not see why a passenger who, by the default of the railway company was obliged to walk home in the dark might not recover in respect of such damage, it being an event which might not unreasonably be expected to occur.

COCKBURN, C.J. (for the Court).—The case of Mangan v. Atterton was cited before us as a strong authority in favour of the defendant. The defendant had there exposed in a public market place a machine for crushing oil cake without its being thrown out of gear or the handle being fastened, or any person having the care of it: the plaintiff, a boy of four years of age, returning from school with his brother, a boy of seven, and some other boys, stopped at the machine. One of the boys began to turn the handle; the plaintiff, at the suggestion of his brother, placed his hand on the cogs of the wheels, and the machine being set in motion, three of his fingers were crushed. It was held by the Court of Exchequer that the defendant was not liable—first, because there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, or if there was such negligence it was too remote; secondly, because the injury was caused by the act of the boy who turned the handle, and of the plaintiff himself, who was a trespasser. With the latter ground of the decision we have in the present case nothing to do: otherwise we should have to consider whether it should prevail against the cases cited with which it is obviously in conflict. If the decision as to negligence is in conflict with our judgment in this case, we can only say we do not acquiesce in it. It appears to us that a man who leaves in a public place, along which persons, and amongst them children, have to pass, a dangerous machine which may be fatal to any one who touches it, without any precaution against mischief, is not only guilty of negligence, but of negligence of a very reprehensible character, and not the less so because the imprudent and unauthorised act of another may be necessary to realise the mischief to which the unlawful act or negligence of the defendant has given occasion. But be this as it may, the case cannot govern the present. For the decision proceeded expressly on the ground that there had been no default in the defendant; here it cannot be disputed that the act of the defendant was unlawful.

BIGHAM, J.—The same rule of law was acted upon in the case of Holmes v. N. E. Ry. Mr. Cyril Dodd suggested that the rule was extended in that case and that the duty was held to be something greater than the duty to use reasonable care. He suggested that it was there held that the defendant was liable as if he warranted the safety of the premises in all cases except that of a latent danger which was not discoverable by ordinary care. But an examination of the judgments (and I refer particularly to the judgment of Cleasby, B.) shows that the same measure of liability was applied as in Undermaur v. Dames (L. R. 1 C. P. 274). Moreover the real point under discussion in that case was whether the plaintiff was a mere licensee, or was in the position of a person invited to go on the premises upon the business of himself and the defendants; the other point as to the measure of liability only arose incidentally.

COLLINS, L.J.—That case belongs to the class of bailments of which the case of carriers is an example. The plaintiff had intrusted himself to the defendant to be carried, and there was a clear duty on the part of the bailee towards the bailor not to be guilty of gross negligence causing injury to him. That case can have no application to the present one, where the defendants were not bailees but lenders [of an engine whose boiler was defective and exploded, injuring the borrowers].

BRETT, M.R.—Langridge v. Levy is not an easy case to act upon. It is not, it cannot be, accurately reported; the declaration is set out; the evidence is assumed to be reported; the questions left to the jury are stated. And then it is said that a motion is made to enter a non-suit in pursuance of leave reserved on particular grounds. These grounds do not raise the question of fraud at all, but only the question of remoteness. And, although the question of fraud seems in a sense to have been left to the jury, yet no question was, according to the report, left to them as to whether the plaintiff acted on the faith of the fraudulent misrepresentation, which is, nevertheless, a necessary question in a case of fraudulent misrepresentation. The report of the argument makes the object of the argument depend entirely upon an assumed motion to arrest the judgment, which raises always a discussion depending entirely on the form of the declaration and the effect on it of a verdict, in respect of which it is assumed that all questions were left to the jury. If this was the point taken, the report of the evidence and of the questions left to the jury is idle! The case was decided on the ground of a fraudulent misrepresentation as stated in the declaration. It is inferred that the defendant intended the representation to be communicated to the son. Why he should have such an intention, in fact, it seems difficult to understand. His immediate object must have been to induce the father to buy and pay for the gun. It must have been wholly indifferent to him whether after the sale and payment the gun would be used or not by the son. I cannot hesitate to say that in my opinion the case is a wholly unsatisfactory case to act on as an authority.—p. 511.

WRIGHT, J.—Some English decisions—such as Jones v. Boyce ((1816) 1 Stark. 493); Wilkins v. Day; Harris v. Mobbs—are cited in Deven on Negligence as inconsistent with the decision in Victorian Railway Commissioners v. Coultas (13 App. Cas. 222). But I think that those cases are to be explained on a different ground, namely, that the damage which immediately resulted from the act of the passenger or of the horse, was really the result, not of that act, but of a fright which rendered that act involuntary, and which therefore ought to be regarded as itself the direct and immediate cause of the damage.

MELLOR, J.—The dictum of Williams, J. is no doubt entitled to very great respect, but it is to be observed that the judgment in the case of Pickard v. Smith merely decides that the occupier was responsible; we do not say that there was not abundant justification for that decision, and there is no expression in the judgment itself which at all conflicts with our decision [holding the master liable].—p. 278.

FIELD, J.—The only difficulty is that created by the supposed dictum of Williams, J. in Pickard v. Smith. But there is really nothing in the judgment in that case, or the reasoning on which it is founded, which conflicts with our present decision.—p. 279.

GROVE, J.—This is not the mere case of a person lawfully coming into premises for the purposes of business, but the defendant must have known that the plaintiff must necessarily get into the truck for the purpose of unloading the coal. The only case that seems somewhat in defendant's favour is Collis v. Selden, where it was alleged that the defendant improperly and negligently hung a chandelier in a public-house. . . . It seems to me that the (latter) case was really decided on the ground of the uncertainty of the declaration as to the relation between the plaintiff and the defendant. I must say I should myself have felt some difficulty in coming to the same conclusion as the Court came to in that case.

But I do not think that the case is really an authority which bears upon the circumstances of the present case.

LORD HERSCHELL.—In both those cases [Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co. and Heaven v. Pender] there was a concealed danger, which could not have been avoided by the persons using the premises. I will assume that if the barge had been in a condition inherently dangerous, this case would have come within those authorities, and that an action would lie. But in the present case there is certainly no concealment about the danger which is said to exist. The negligence which is alleged is not providing the barge with a cover for the hatchway.—p. 455.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am quite unable to see that that case has any application to the present case at all. This wagon, at the time it was being used, was being used on a new journey initiated by the Glasgow and S. W. Railway for their purposes, and there was nothing in it which can be said to be comparable to a trap created by or permitted to exist by the Caledonian Co., into which they invited and led the deceased man to come. Therefore Heaven v. Pender seems to me entirely without application to the present case; and, as I have said, I am quite unable to see any duty resting upon the Caledonian Co. to the deceased man, a breach of which has cost the loss of his life, and consequently a right of action in the plaintiff.—p. 4.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I do not think the case of Butler v. Hunter is consistent with my view of the law. I do not know whether the Court of Exchequer meant to deny that such a duty was cast upon the defendant in that case, or meant to say that he might escape liability by employing a contractor. If either was meant by the Court of Exchequer, I am obliged to differ from them.—p. 447.

KELLY, C.B.—Francis v. Cockrell only shows that where a chattel is supplied on hire for a consideration there is an implied undertaking that it is reasonably fit for the purpose for which it is supplied. MELLISH, L.J. (for the Court).—Francis v. Cockrell is based upon Readhead v. Midland Ry. (post, cols. 2667—8), and is therefore of itself no more a binding authority on us in this case than the other. It is true, however, that the Lord Chief Baron, going further than the doubt expressed by M. Smith, J., does recognise the limitation [that the article is reasonably fit for the purpose intended] as applicable to contracts of purchase and sale. But the statement of the learned judge was not necessary, and therefore is not binding, though, of course, inviting a careful consideration. After such consideration, for the reasons before given, we are of opinion that the undertaking of the present defendant was not restricted by the limitation applied to the contract of carriage in Readhead v. Midland Ry.—p. 264.

BLACKBURN, J. (for the consulted Judges).—With the greatest respect for those who joined in that decision [Metcalf v. Hetherington] we think it was erroneous.—p. 120.

[LORD WENSLEYDALE would have been disposed to abide by Metcalf v. Hetherington had he not thought the question decided in an opposite sense by Mersey Docks, &c. v. Cameron and Jones v. Mersey Docks, &c. (11 H. L. C. 443). LORD WESTBURY did not specially mention the case, but expressed a general concurrence on points of law with Blackburn, J.]

[With respect to the case of Duncan v. Findlater (supra), which had been impugned by Blackburn, J.]

LORD WESTBURY.—I think it desirable to say a few words with reference to the difficulty felt by the learned judges in consequence of certain observations that fell from Lord Chancellor Cottenham, and which are reported in the case of Duncan v. Findlater. I can well divine what was at that time passing in the mind of Lord Cottenham. He seems to have thought that if persons constituting a corporation are trustees of property for the direct benefit of certain individuals, and there is no other than corporate property,—and, if in their capacity as trustees an act is done, by order of the corporation, which amounts to a tort or trespass, and gives a right of action and a right to damages to any private individual, a Court of equity would not permit an execution to issue, on any judgment that might be recovered, against the property of the corporation, seeing that it is property held upon trust for certain beneficiaries, and that the corporation, as trustees, have no interest therein. . . . Those observations of Lord Cottenham which directly tend to this conclusion—that the corporation in the case supposed would not be amenable, nor would the corporate property be liable, but that the party injured would be obliged to have resort to the individual members who directed the act to be done—would, if they were recognised as the law, undoubtedly lead to very great evil and injury. My lords, I confine my observations to the case of a remedy sought for a wrongful act, because your lordships are very well aware that the rule has been well established that, if in the case of contract entered into with a corporation created by Act of Parliament, the contract is made by the corporation ultra vires of the corporation, the party may not be entitled to recover under that contract. That may be a very convenient rule, and it is not at all affected by the considerations we are now dealing with. But with regard to the observations attributed to the noble and learned Chancellor, Lord Cottenham, I conceive that they ought not to be taken or regarded as establishing any rule that at all interferes with the decision at which your lordships have arrived in the case now before you.—p. 126.

Reasonable care is not shown when after notice of danger at a particular spot no inquiry is made as to its existence and extent, and no warning is given. The principle of liability for negligence established by Parnaby v. Lancaster Canal Co. and *Mersey Dock Trustees v. BOWEN, L.J.—On this point the plaintiffs relied upon Cann v. Willson, which if it is good law, is in their favour. It is, therefore, necessary to refer to Derry v. Peek (ante, vol. i., col. 403), which, in my judgment, has overruled Cann v. Willson. . . . The first thing . . . that Derry v. Peek decided was that a plaintiff cannot succeed in an action of fraud without proving that the defendant was fraudulent, and that negligence does not of itself, in the absence of dishonesty, amount to fraud.

But Derry v. Peek decided something further. It decided that, in such cases as the present, there is no duty enforceable in law to be careful. Negligent misrepresentation does not amount to deceit, and only gives rise to a cause of action if there is a duty upon the defendant to be careful; and in Derry v. Peek the H. L. said that the circumstances raised no such duty. Is there such a duty upon the defendant here? It was sought to invoke the authority of Cann v. Willson to persuade us that there was such a duty. The law of England might, of course, be that such a duty was imposed in such cases; but the question is what the law is. It is said that Heaven v. Pender and cases of that class show that the defendant had a duty to the plaintiff. But it is useless for us to embark upon the consideration of cases decided upon totally different circumstances. It is perfectly plain that the owner of a chattel, such as a horse or a gun of such a character that if it is used carelessly it will be likely to injure a third person who is near, is bound to be careful in the use of it. The owner of premises is in the same position. If he knows that they are in a dangerous condition, and that people are coming there to work by his permission and invitation, he must take reasonable care to protect them. That is so because he has the conduct and control of the premises. Heaven v. Pender is an instance of this latter class of case, but it has nothing to do with the present case. It could only have a bearing upon it if it decided that a person making a certificate is liable, if it is not true, to any person he may have reason to suppose is likely to act upon it. But the law of England does not regard a certificate as a gun or other dangerous instrument, and does not, in the absence of contract and of fraud, hold a man responsible for drawing a document carelessly. In Cunn v. Willson, owing to a misapprehension of Heaven v. Pender, it was held that such a duty existed. But when Scholes v. Brook (63 Law Times, 837) came before Romer, J., that learned judge, after his attention had been called to the decision of the H. L. in Derry v. Peek, said: "Cases have been cited which, it is said, establish such a liability. But, apart from Cunn v. Willson, it appears to me that the authorities may be divided into two classes. One of those classes is when one person invites another to come upon his premises, in which case the person giving the invitation must use reasonable care to ensure that the condition of the premises does not subject the person invited to danger. Another class is where a person becomes liable for using or leaving about in such a way as to cause danger an instrument which is dangerous in itself. Beyond those two classes I am not aware, for the moment, of any circumstances under which a person can be held liable in a case such as that which has been argued before me. But the present case falls within neither of those two classes. An invitation to advance money or take shares on a valuation, or on a prospectus, does not, I think, come within the first class, nor can a valuation or a prospectus be considered a dangerous instrument within the meaning of that term as used above by me; and, that being so, I think that, if the plaintiff had not established a contract, this action must have failed, unless I followed Cunn v. Willson; but with reference to that case, after the speeches of the learned lords in Derry v. Peek, I find a difficulty in following it, and I think the case would not have been decided as it was after the judgment of the H. L., which, by implication, negatives the existence of any such general rule as laid down in Cunn v. Willson." It is obvious from this that Romer, J. took exactly the same view of Heaven v. Pender as we are now doing.—pp. 356, 357, 358.

PHILLIMORE, J.—That decision is in point, and if we decide now in favour of the plaintiff
 we must disagree with it. It rests mainly, I think, upon the principle that Acts of Parliament are to be deemed not to apply to non-resident aliens unless the Court is compelled so to apply them. There are a number of decisions upon the construction of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which set forth this principle as applicable to the construction of statutes imposing a burden upon a foreigner. Perhaps the strongest of these is Cope v. Doherty (2 De G. & J. 614). But even in this case the reservation of Knight Bruce, L.J. would make me pause. On the other hand, where it is a case of giving a remedy to a foreigner, the decision of Dr. Lushington in The Milford, and the constant practice which has followed upon that decision, is the other way. This latter position is, I think, sound.

LORD SELBORNE.—The scrip in this case is not one of those contracts in writing which have their nature, incidents, and effects defined and regulated by British law, so that a judge in a British Court is bound without evidence to know whether (and how if at all) they are legally transferable, and to reject any evidence of a customary mode of transfer at variance with the law. It is not like the iron scrip which was the subject of Lord Cranworth's remarks in Dixon v. Bozill (3 Macq.
 H. L. 1), nor like the bonds in Crouch v. Crédit Foncier. The Court of Q. B., in deciding that case, relied upon the distinction between English instruments made by an English company in England, and a public debt created by a foreign or colonial government, the title to portions of which is by them made to depend on the possession of bonds, expressed to be transferable to the bearer or holder, on which there cannot properly be said to be any right of action at all, though the holder has a claim on a foreign government.
 The Russian and Australian scrip now before your Lordships belongs, in my judgment, to the latter and not to the former category. . . . I desire to express my entire agreement with what was said by the late M.R. (Lord Romilly) in Smith
v. Weggelin (ante, vol. i., col. 1366). . . . I agree

KENNEDY, J. [after discussing at length Crouch
v. Crédit Foncier of England and Goodwin v.
Robarts, continued:] It appears to me that upon the vital question of the effect of modern mercantile usage, such as I think has been sufficiently proved in the present case, it is impossible to treat the reasoning of the Court of Queen's

Bench in Crouch v. Crédit Foncier of England and the reasoning of the Exchequer Chamber in Goodwin v. Roberts as capable of reconciliation. I read the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in the latter case as plainly disapproving of this reasoning in the judgment on the earlier case. It cannot, I think, be maintained that the reasoning of the judgment upon this question of the effect of modern mercantile usage in Goodwin v. Roberts was unnecessary to the decision. Nor, I think, can it be maintained that the two judgments are capable of reconciliation upon the ground that the instrument in question in the earlier case was an English instrument, and the instrument in the latter case was, though issued by a London agent, to all intents and purposes the scrip of a foreign government. . . . Lastly, in the case of Rumball v. Metropolitan Bank, a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division in the year 1887 treated Goodwin v. Roberts as decisive of an action in which a similar question arose upon an English instrument—a scrip certificate to bearer issued by an English joint stock company. The case was argued upon a special case. The case stated a usage among bankers, discounters, money lenders, and on the Stock Exchange for many years, to treat such scrip certificates as negotiable instruments transferable by mere delivery. The Court, it may be noted, consisted of Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J., the former being the judge who had delivered the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Goodwin v. Roberts, and the other one of the judges who took part in the decision of that case. It is impossible to suppose that they were not fully aware of all that could possibly be held to distinguish (if anything could) the two decisions, and Crouch v. Crédit Foncier of England was cited to them in argument. But in their considered judgment they held the matter of the effect of usage in conferring negotiability upon an English instrument, although not negotiable either by statute or by the “ancient mercantile law,” as settled by the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Goodwin v. Roberts; while they also held upon the facts in the case before them that the second ground of decision adopted by the House of Lords in Goodwin v. Roberts—the ground of estoppel—applied to the case before them. . . . It appears to me that, having regard to the decisions of the Exchequer Chamber in Goodwin v. Roberts and Rumball v. Metropolitan Bank, if I have come, as I have, to the conclusion that there has been a sufficient proof of a mercantile usage to treat the debentures in question in this case as negotiable, I cannot refuse to follow these decisions, which, for the reasons I have felt myself bound to state at length, appear to me practically to overrule the decision in Crouch v. Crédit Foncier of England and to govern this case.—p. 994.

ESHER, M.R.—But it was suggested that these documents [post-office orders] had been treated as between the post office, and bankers and parties presenting them through bankers, as if they were negotiable instruments, though, in fact, they are not, so that the doctrine applied in Goodwin v. Roberts was applicable. But that decision was upon a special case, in which there was a statement to the effect that the documents there in question had been treated as negotiable instruments by all parties dealing with the same, by bankers and mercantile men, both in this country, and all over Europe, for more than fifty years. It was held upon that statement in the Courts below, and ultimately in the House of Lords, that for the purposes of the question at issue the documents must be treated as if they were negotiable instruments, and so, if there had been a conversion, it was one of which advantage could not be taken. I do not think it can be said that the documents here in question have obtained the same position as that of the documents in Goodwin v. Roberts. It seems clear that they have not been treated as negotiable instruments by the general practice in England. I do not think it is shown that bankers or merchants or the post office have, for all purposes and with regard to all persons, so treated them. They have none of the attributes of negotiable instruments. It is urged that the doctrine of estoppel, as stated in Goodwin v. Roberts, ought to be applied to this case. The House of Lords there said that, even if the instruments were not negotiable, the mode in which they had been treated both here and abroad was such that it must be taken that the plaintiff was aware of it, and that in handing them over to another person, he put it in his power to hand them over as negotiable instruments. I think that the proposition, as there stated, was only stated as applicable to the facts of the special case, which contained a statement that the form of instrument then in question had been treated as a negotiable instrument by the mercantile world, and by all parties dealing with it, both in this country and abroad. It does not seem to me that there is anything in this case upon which such an estoppel could be founded by the plaintiffs. . . . For these reasons, I think the case falls within the ordinary rules as to conversion, and not within the doctrine of Goodwin v. Roberts.—p. 710.

JAMES, L.J.—In Le Neve v. Le Neve, which turned upon the Middlesex Registry Act, Lord Hardwicke came to the conclusion that the protection which was meant to be afforded was a protection against secret incumbrances, and that it never could have been the intention of the legislature to put a man who had knowledge of a conveyance in the position of a man who was liable to be defrauded or injured by the existence of some secret dealings with the land. From that time, whatever expressions of doubt may have been used as to some of the language in the decisions, that has been the universal course of decision. In Davis v. Strathmore (Earl) (supra, col. 1984), Lord Eldon expresses the principle of the decisions in very clear language to the effect that those statutes did not affect or take away the jurisdiction of Courts of equity to enforce equitable rights depending upon contract, and in the case of contracts relating to land, as in all other contracts, equity enforced them, not only as against the man who entered into them, but as against his heirs, and against volunteers under him, and as against persons who took his estate with notice of the contract, or trust, or obligation, with which he had bound his estate. Lord Eldon pointed out in that case that there was no altering the language of the Acts of Parliament, there was no dealing with or in any way repealing the Acts directly or indirectly, but giving the Acts their full force, that is to say, leaving the estate to go in priority to the man who had registered, still if that man had notice of anything by which his vendor or his grantor had bound himself, he was bound by it.—p. 571.

FRY, J.—After I left the Court the day before yesterday, it occurred to me that there was one point in the argument to which I had not sufficiently referred in my judgment. I mean the argument that the doctrine of Kennedy v. Green applied, and that Richardson and Watson were parties to such a scheme of fraud as to repel the presumption of their communicating the plaintiffs' lien to those persons who employed them. It was pressed upon me that there was a course of dealing by them which led to the suppression of their knowledge of the lien, that they persuaded the various purchasers to employ their solicitors, and that they themselves executed conveyances containing a covenant that the land was free from incumbrances. With regard to the last point it must be borne in mind that Richardson and Watson were not solicitors, and, although it was highly improper for them to enter into such a covenant while the lien existed, yet it was not fraudulent if they at the same time communicated the existence of the lien to the purchasers. And that is the very point under inquiry. With regard to the argument that they had a scheme for preventing the disclosure of the lien, I cannot come to that conclusion for this reason, that, although in many cases the purchasers employed them as their general agents, in other cases the purchasers did not, and Richardson and Watson appear to have made no objection to the employment of independent solicitors whenever the purchasers wished it. In several cases the independent solicitors obtained knowledge of the lien, and Richardson and Watson had no difficulty in making arrangements with the plaintiffs by which the lien was in effect released. That being so, I cannot conclude that Richardson and Watson were engaged in a scheme of fraud, and therefore, in my opinion, the doctrine in Kennedy v. Green does not apply.—p. 715.

PEARSON, J.—In West v. Reid (supra), Wigram, V.-C., referring to Jones v. Smith, said: "There is nothing in the fact of marriage which raised a legal presumption or inference that [money belonging to a married woman] was settled;" and in Dawson v. Prince it was doubted by Knight Bruce and Turner, L.J.J. whether the fact that a bill was made payable to the order of a married woman was notice that it related to her separate estate.—p. 226.

FRY, J.—The doctrine applicable to the question has been commonly called that of constructive notice. Lord Chelmsford, in Espin v. Pemberton, considered that to be an inaccurate description, and thought that the expression "imputed notice" was the correct one. It is not very material to consider which of the two terms is the more accurate, because there is undoubtedly an exception to the construction or imputation of notice from the agent to the principal, that exception arising in the case of such conduct by the agent as raises a conclusive presumption that he would not communicate the fact in controversy. This exception has been put in two ways. In the very well-known case of Rolland v. Hart (supra), Lord Hatherley put it substantially in this way, that you must look at the circumstances of the case, and inquire whether the Court can see that the solicitor intended a fraud, which would require the suppression of the knowledge of the incumbrance from the person upon whom he was committing the fraud. In Thompson v. Cartwright, the late M.R. put it rather differently, and it would appear that in his view you must inquire whether there are such circumstances in the case, independently of the fact under inquiry, as to raise an inevitable conclusion that the notice had not been communicated.—p. 643.

STIRLING, L.J.—As to the former [Freeman v. Laing], it seems sufficient to say that it was decided on the law relating to tacking, and the learned judge expressly states that no question arose as to the effect of a purchase for value without notice; and it may for the present purpose be left out of consideration. As to the latter [Boursot v. Savage], I do not doubt that it was correctly decided according to the law as it stood in 1866; but the Conveyancing Act, 1882, has introduced very considerable modifications to which the Court is now bound to give effect.—p. 486.

WILLIAMS, J. (for the Court).—The question for our consideration seems to be, whether the case of Hole v. Barlow was well decided, and we are of opinion that it was not (p. 74). POLLOCK, B.—My attention was particularly called . . . to the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the case of Hawley v. Steele, declining to grant an injunction on motion to restrain a general in her Majesty's army and the officers under his command from causing or permitting rifle practice on a common in close proximity to the plaintiff's house, which, as he alleged, was a serious nuisance and occasioned damage to his property. The principle upon which the injunction was refused has no doubt a material bearing upon the present case, and I in no way differ from what was there stated by the Master of the Rolls. But I cannot follow the course of the argument by which it is submitted, that any true analogy exists between the case of lands vested in the Secretary of State for War "for the purpose of the defence of the realm," and a power given to acquire or build an asylum for sick paupers. In the first case it would be extremely difficult to contemplate the use of land for military purposes which does not carry with it the right to fire guns. In the present case I cannot, upon the materials presented to me, draw the inference that an asylum for sick paupers, including those suffering from small-pox, cannot be maintained without the creation of a nuisance.

LORD SELBORNE.—I doubt much whether the order now under appeal would have been made if it had not been supposed in the Courts below that the principle of your lordships' decision in *Metropolitan Asylum District v. LINDLEY, M.R.—Sect. 9 of the Gasworks Clauses Consolidation Act, 1871 [which provides that nothing in the Act shall exonerate the undertakers from proceedings for nuisance], is clear and unambiguous. This section is made applicable to the defendant company and to the works complained of by sects. 2 and 3 of their special Act of 1873. This section is, in my opinion, conclusive against the defendants. If they could show any enactment expressly or by necessary implication authorising them in terms to erect a gasometer at the place where this is, and of the dimensions desired by them, or any express or necessarily implied authority to cut through the stratum of running silt, and if they could show that it was impossible to exercise those clearly conferred powers without creating damage to their neighbours, the decision in London, Brighton and South Coast Ry. v. Truman would protect them. But the statutes which we have to consider fall far short of what is necessary to exclude the application of sect. 9 of the Act of 1871. Upon this part of the case the decision of Att.-Gen. v. Leeds Corporation is very instructive. It was there in vain contended that an enactment similar to that contained in sect. 9 was inapplicable, because what was authorised could not be done without causing a nuisance to other people. The answer was that there was nothing to show that Parliament knew that such was the case, and nothing which clearly authorised the acts of the defendants even if they occasioned a nuisance.—p. 464.

PEARSON, J.—Again, in Salvin v. North Brancepeth Coal Co., which was a case of alleged injury to trees and grounds generally by fumes from a chemical factory, and which both Jessel, M.R. and the Court of Appeal considered was not made out by the evidence, Mellish, L.J. said: "... I do not think, therefore, that I shall be very far wrong if I lay it down that there are at least two necessary ingredients for a quia timet action. There must, if no actual damage is proved, be proof of imminent danger, and there must also be proof that the apprehended damage will, if it comes, be very substantial. I should almost say that it must be proved that it will be irreparable, because, if the danger is not proved to be so imminent that no one can doubt, that if the remedy is delayed, the damage will be suffered, I think it must be shown that, if the damage does occur at any time, it will come in such a way and under such circumstances that it will be impossible for the plaintiff to protect himself against it if relief is denied to him in a quia timet action."—p. 696.

Fletcher v. Bealey (1885) 54 L. J. Ch. 424; 28 Ch. D. 688; 52 L. T. 541; 33 W. R. 745.
PEARSON, J.—In Att.-Gen. v. Corporation of Kingston an information had been filed against the corporation of Kingston, because they were proceeding to pour a large quantity of sewage into the river Thames. They were connecting their own system of drainage with a new main sewer, in such a way as greatly to enlarge the quantity of sewage coming into the river Thames.

After discussing the Act of Parliament under which the corporation had power to do this, and concluding that, if they did create a nuisance, they were not justified by the Acts under which they were incorporated, Wood, V.-C. said, "It remained then to be considered whether there was evidence of an actual nuisance committed, or evidence of the extreme probability of a nuisance, if that which was being done was allowed to continue. The difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs was, that it was necessary for them to establish the existence of an actual immediate nuisance, and not a mere quia timet case of injury a hundred years hence, when chemical contrivances might have been discovered for preventing the evil."

[Their lordships (LORDS CRANWORTH, L.C. and BROUGHAM), although they held that it was not necessary to pronounce a final opinion on the authority of these cases, yet expressed grave doubts as to the correctness of the doctrine there acted upon by Lord Cottenham, that a contract entered into by the projectors of a railway must necessarily bind the railway company when constituted; in other words, that the railway company, being the successors of the projectors, must take existence subject to the burdens contracted for by those who were the promoters of it, and to whom it owed its existence.]

[LORDS CRANWORTH, L.C. and BROUGHAM held that the doctrine of the above cases rested on no sound principle and might lead, as in Lord Petre's Case he thought it did lead, to great injustice. Their lordships, however, thinking the present case distinguishable, did not expressly decide whether they should still adhere to Lord Cottenham's decisions, or depart from them.]

CHITTY, J.—It was argued . . . that that decision [Lowestoft, &c. Co.] turned on the fact that the parliamentary agent there was also a promoter, but the Master of the Rolls did not refer to that circumstance in his judgment, and the fact mentioned in the report that a member of his firm was one of the promoters would not have been sufficient of itself to make him a promoter. . . . The decision of Malins, V.-C., in Kensington Station Act, In re (supra), in which he allowed the parliamentary agent's claim, turned upon sect. 5 of the Abandonment of Railways Act, 1869, and the question whether he was a promoter.

JESSEL, M.R.—Abel v. Heathcote is the first case to which I need refer. The best report of it is in Brown. . . . Though the Lords Commissioners doubted and differed, when the case came before Lord Loughborough, he laid down the general proposition that the ordinary power of sale and exchange would authorise a partition. It was not until M'Queen v. Farquhar that there was any doubt about that. Lord Eldon says: ". . . I doubt, whether the language I hear and have read, that a power of exchange is well executed by a partition, is authorised by anything in that decision. Exchange and partition are very different. According to Sheppard's Touchstone and other old books—whether he had looked at them I do not know—the only old book referred to in the Touchstone is Perkins—'you cannot exchange, until there has been a partition. There is infinite difficulty in saying, a partition under the execution of a power by a tenant for life with those who have the inheritance in the other moiety can be called an exchange.'" If that means anything, it means this, that having legal uses to deal with, the act must be good at law if good at all. Exchange is different from partition, and you cannot exchange until after partition. That is the ground of Lord Eldon's doubt. Of course, after that decision, the point was considered and was treated by Sir T. Plumer in Att.-Gen. v. Hamilton as too doubtful for a title depending on it to be forced on a purchaser. The next case . . . is Doe v. Spencer. . . . The point arose directly, and the question was one of common law, whether there is any substantial difference, as was put in the Touchstone, between exchange and partition. The decision was, that as regards tenants in common at all events . . . there is no ground for the assertion. I may observe that Mr. Preston, in his valuable edition of the Touchstone, puts in brackets, after the dictum, "Where is the objection to such an exchange of an undivided moiety?" He could not find any objection. But whatever the authority that the Touchstone, standing alone, might be of as a recognised text book, it is overruled by Doe v. Spencer. . . That is an express decision (of course I must not go further than the decision), that a power of exchange, where an undivided moiety is settled, does enable you to make a partition by exchanging with the owner of the other undivided moiety. The only other case which I need cite is Bradshaw v. Fane. The question there arose on title. . . Kindersley, V.-C. . . winds up, by stating his opinion really to be in favour of the power of exchange, including power to partition; but he says that it is so doubtful upon the authorities that he would not decide the abstract proposition in order to force the title upon an unwilling purchaser. He did decide the case upon another point, namely, the wording of the power, and on that he decided that the title was good. That is the state of the authorities. Lord St. Leonards says that the point wants a decision to make it quite clear, and I am willing to give that decision (supposing the doubt is not already taken away by the decision of the Court of Exchequer, followed by Kindersley, V.-C.). I hold that the passage in the Touchstone is not good law, and that there can be such an exchange. And if you can have such an exchange, why cannot there be an exchange of an undivided moiety in Whiteacre for another undivided moiety in Blackacre? I decide that there can be such an exchange. There is a conflict between what the judges said in Doe v. Spencer, and what the V.-C. intimated his opinion to be in Bradshaw v. Fane. It is not necessary for me to decide that question. If I had to decide it, I should feel inclined to follow the decision of the V.-C.: for if it can be done as between two, I do not see why it cannot be done as between three.—pp. 782—785.

Rimington v. Hartley (1880) 14 Ch. D. 630; 43 L. T. 15; 29 W. R. 42.

JESSEL, M.R.—If sect. 6 of the Partition Act, 1876, is to be read reddendo singula singulis, as stated by the learned V.-C. in Platt v. Platt, then the words "person of unsound mind" do not include, as they ought to do, a person of unsound mind not so found, for the request is to be made only by the "committee in lunacy." Now, how does a person under disability sue, or how is he sued? By his next friend or guardian ad litem. If he is an infant, who is the "person authorised to act" on his behalf? It must be the person who is authorised to act on his behalf in the action, that is, his next friend or guardian ad litem. The request must be made by a person before the Court in the action; but, according to the V.-C.'s view, it may be made by a person who is not before the Court. Take the case of an infant having a living father. He can have no guardian to act on his behalf in an action but a guardian ad litem. But in this case, in nineteenth of the actions under the Partition Acts, if, as the V.-C. says, the word "guardian" in the section means only a testamentary guardian, or a guardian appointed by the Court, then the father, who is the guardian by law, is omitted altogether. What does the word "guardian," standing alone, generally mean? I suppose guardian of the person. An infant may have several guardians: he may have a guardian of the person, or a guardian in socage, or in gavelkind, or, if he has a copyhold estate, a guardian according to the custom of the manor. But I suppose "guardian" of an infant means guardian of the person. . . . In my opinion, the section means that the request is to be made by the person authorised in the action to act on behalf of the person under disability, that is, the next friend or guardian ad litem. That makes the section complete.—p. 631.

JESSEL, M.R.—I must say I should not have found any difficulty in this case, had it not been for two decisions of Bacon, V.-C. Those decisions do not appear to me to be quite consistent, and with great respect I do not think they are right. In Crookes v. Whitworth the V.-C. decided that in a partition action a request for sale by a married woman might be made by her counsel authorised to act on her behalf—that is, without her separate examination. In Shaw, In re, he held that in a similar action, a married woman's election to take her share (though under 200*l.*) of the proceeds of sale of real estate, as personalty could only be taken by her separate examination.—p. 290.

KAY, J.—In Wallace v. Greenwood the late M. R. said: "Where the Court has power to sell an infant's real estate, and orders it to be sold, the order operates as a conversion, and the estate then becomes personalty." I respectfully say that I agree with that dictum.—p. 245.

BYRNE, J.—Two questions were argued before me, the broader one being whether or not a sale ordered by the Court under the provisions of the Partition Acts of 1868 and 1876, upon a request for sale made on the part of an infant by his next friend, effects an out-and-out conversion of his real estate, or whether, in the event of his death under the age of twenty-one, there is an equity for reconversion on the part of his heir. It is clear that but for sect. 6 of the Act of 1876 such an equity would exist (see Foster v. Foster (1875) 45 L. J. Ch. 301; 1 Ch. D. 588; 24 W. R. 185), and I doubt whether Sir G. Jessel in Wallace v. Greenwood meant to maintain that such an equity for reconversion on the part of the heir would be lost simply by reason of the sale having been made at the request of the infant. For a sale, upon request being made, takes place under a special statute, and is subject to statutory incidents, among which is included a provision for reinvestment of the proceeds of sale in real estate, until such time as the infant, being of full age, could ask for payment as to a person absolutely entitled. Haward v. Jalland was also referred to, and I have been furnished with office copies of the judgment and orders made in that case. [His lordship discussed them and continued.] This case appears to me to be an authority for saying that where an infant by next friend is one of several plaintiffs by counsel requesting a sale, and a sale is ordered upon such request, the proceeds of the infant's share ought to be earmarked as real estate. In the present case, however, it does not appear to me to be necessary to decide whether Haward v. Jalland is reconcilable with some of the observations in Wallace v. Greenwood.—p. 34.

NORTH, J.—I cannot accept Stedman, In re, as an authority that, in all partition actions, the title to the property is to be proved in Court instead of directing an inquiry in chambers. This may be a very proper course to adopt in simple cases, and especially when the value of the property is but small: and I have myself followed that course.—p. 232.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I see that in this case Malins, V.-C. says he still thinks the view he took [in Pemberton v. Barnes, supra] of the construction of that section [Partition Act, 1868, s. 4], preferable to that put upon it by the L.C. I cannot agree with him; but the L.C. (Lord Hatherley) did express an opinion that the 5th section was applicable to proceedings under the 3rd and 4th sections, and was intended to give the Court a discretionary power to prevent a sale under these sections if the opposing party was willing to bind himself to take the applicant's share at a valuation; and this is contrary to the opinion I have just expressed. I think if this had been intended it would have been properly expressed in the form of a proviso on the 3rd and 4th sections, and not by a fresh substantive enactment; and it would have been properly expressed by saying that the Court shall not direct a sale if the other parties undertake, &c., and not by saying that the Court may direct a sale, unless, &c. But I cannot think it was intended; a sale by valuation is a very different thing from an open sale, and I do not see why a party should be forced to sell his property at a valuation; and I think that the words used here give him an option to accept such a valuation, if offered to him, but do not compel him to do so.—p. 660.

BRUCE, J.—In order to guide me in the exercise of my discretion, I have tried to find some analogy in other branches of the law. I do not mean to say that the case of the sale of real property is in all respects similar to the case of the sale of ships; but there is some analogy. In Pitt v. Jones a sale of real property was directed by the C. A. and sanctioned by the H. L., on the ground that it was for the general interest, on the application of only three-sixteenths of the owners.—p. 236.

FRY, L.J. (adopted by PEARSON, J.).—In Swan v. Swan, the Court of EX., sitting as a Court of equity, refused to grant partition to one co-tenant, except upon the terms of his allowing a lien for the expenditure of his co-tenant in permanent improvements. But it appears doubtful how far this case has been generally followed; and it does not appear to me to be consistent with the opinion expressed by Lord Romilly, M.R., in Teasdale v. Sanderson (post). . . . There [Hamilton v. Denny] a lease had been made to A. and B. as joint tenants. B. had settled his moiety of the property. A. had made a payment of the renewal fines, and he was held to be entitled to a lien on B.'s settled share. The decision was placed upon two grounds. It was said to be like the case of payments by a mortgagee, and it was said that the payments by A. were entitled to the same benefit as if they had been payments made by a trustee. It is, perhaps, not perfectly easy to see the strict analogy between these two cases and the case then before the Court. But, in my view, these two authorities are not sufficient to establish any such general proposition as that the right to contribution creates any lien on the property in respect of which the expenditure has been made, and they certainly are insufficient to support the plaintiff's case. For in both those cases the submission to a lien was required from the plaintiff as a term of other relief which he sought, whilst in the case now before me the plaintiff is affirmatively asserting his right.—p. 564.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I think that the ratio decidendi (of Cox v. Hickman, infra) is that the proposition laid down in Waugh v. Carver, viz., that the participation in the profits of a business, does of itself, by operation of law, constitute a partnership, is not a correct statement of the law of England, but that the true question is, as stated by Lord Cranworth, whether the trade is carried on on behalf of the person sought to be charged as a partner, the participation in the profits being a most important element in determining that question, but not being in itself decisive; the test being, in the language of Lord Wensleydale, whether it is such a participation of profits as to constitute the relation of principal and agent between the person taking the profits and those actually carrying on the business.

Howard, In re, Tennant, Ex parte (1877) 6 Ch. D. 303; 37 L. T. 284; 25 W. R. 854.—C.A. COTTON, L.J.—It is impossible to say that the rule laid down in Waugh v. Carver is now unqualified law. Lord Blackburn, in Bullen v. Sharp (supra), clearly refers to it as qualified. . . . Certainly, the Master of the Rolls does not in any way dissent from the proposition of law so laid down, because he quotes, with approval, the authority of Lindley, J., stating the rule in substantially the same way. The Master of the Rolls, in Pooley v. Driver, says:—"I may cite further from p. 35 of the third edition of Mr. Lindley's book, considering that learned gentleman is now a judge, the conclusion that he comes to as to the effect of Cox v. Hickman—'that, prima facie, the relation of principal and agent is constituted by an agreement entitling one person to share the profits made by another to an indefinite extent; but that this inference is displaced if it appears from the whole agreement that no partnership or agency was really intended.'"—p. 315.

SIR MONTAGUE SMITH (for their lordships).—It may be that Waugh v. Carver (supra) [where it was held that participation in net profits made the participant liable as a partner to third parties] and others of the former cases, were rightly decided on their own facts; but the judgment in Cox v. Hickman had certainly the effect of dissolving the rule of law which had been supposed to exist, and laid down principles of decision by which the determination of cases of this kind is made to depend, not on arbitrary presumptions of law, but on the real contracts and relations of the parties. It appears to be now established that, although a right to participate in the profits of trade is a strong test of partnership, and that there may be cases where, from such perception alone, it may, as a presumption, not of law, but of fact, be inferred; yet, that whether that relation does or does not exist must depend on the real intention and contract of the parties.—p. 433.

NORTH, J.—Adopting, then, the rule of law which was laid down before the Act [the Partnership Act, 1890, in Radley v. Consolidated Bank], and which seems to me to be precisely what is intended by sect. 2, sub-sect. 3 of the Act, the receipt by a person of a share of the profits of a business is prima facie evidence that he is a partner in it, and, if the matter stops there, it is evidence upon which the Court must act. But, if there are other circumstances to be considered, they ought to be considered fairly together; not holding that a partnership is proved by the receipt of a share of profits, unless it is rebutted by something else; but taking all the circumstances together, not attaching undue weight to any of them, but drawing an inference from the whole.—p. 399.

COTTON, L.J.—Then there was another case relied upon, the case of Pawsey v. Armstrong. Now, undoubtedly, if that case is to be considered as binding, it would go far to support the plaintiff's contention, because there, as I understand, Kay, J. did lay down that if there was an agreement to share profits and losses, whatever the intention of the parties as expressed in the agreement might be, that of necessity imposed upon them the position of partners with the consequential right of each member of the partnership to have on the dissolution a share in the assets and profits arising upon the sale of those assets. In my opinion, that is not right as between the parties themselves. Whether they be said to be partners in the sense of sharing profits or anything else, you must look for the rights which they have as between themselves to be the fair construction of the contract. But Kay, J. laid down, that if they do share profits and losses, whether they intend to be partners or not, they are partners; and, as I understand it, even if they express by their contract that they do not intend to be so. I dissent from that, and I mention it because hereafter probably it may be said, if I do not mention it, that the Court, when that was quoted, and much relied upon, did not express any dissent, and so therefore it may be assumed that the Court approved of it. Therefore I think it right to give my opinion upon that case.—p. 469.

WIGHTMAN, J.—The case of Wilson v. Whitehead appears to me to be of very questionable authority. The Court gives no reasons for refusing the rule except such as may be collected from observations in the course of the argument of the counsel, who moved unsuccessfully for a rule. From them it may be collected that the Court was much influenced by a supposed analogy between the case before them and that of stage-coach proprietors, where each horses the coach with his own horses for one or more stages, in which case the proprietors of the coach are not jointly liable for provender supplied to the horses of each, as decided in Barton v. Hanson (2 Taunt. 49), an analogy quite inapplicable to the present case, and, as it seems to me, to the case then before the Court.—p. 871.

BOWEN, L.J.—In that case, one of three partners having retired, the remaining partners introduced the plaintiff into the firm, and he, under his contract with them, took upon himself to share with them the liabilities which otherwise they would have borne in their entirety. That was a burden which he took under the contract, and in virtue of the contract. It seems to me, therefore, that upon this principle indemnity was rightly decreed as regards the liabilities of the new firm.

- THESTER, L.J.—The second principle which is to be collected from the cases is, that a partner is not to derive any exclusive advantage by engaging in transactions in rivalry with the firm. That principle is illustrated by the case of *Somerville v. - FRY, J.—It is said that the case of Blisset v. Daniel decides that where articles of partnership contain a clause for expulsion, and where that clause has become inoperative by reason of the accounts not being taken in the manner contemplated by that clause, the machinery is gone, and with the extinction of the machinery the clause itself is extinguished. I need not say again that, if the case decided that, I should follow it implicitly. It does not appear to me that it does. In that case the clause of expulsion was one giving the power of immediate expulsion, the accounts upon which it was to operate were past accounts; the machinery, therefore, was of a kind which must exist then if at all; it was not future, and the Court there held that, the machinery not existing at the time, the expulsion clause itself could not possibly have been put in force, that there was a condition sine qua non to the giving of notice which did not exist.—p. 563.

- Russell v. Russell (1880) 14 Ch. D. 471; 49 L. J. Ch. 268; 42 L. T. 112.
- JESSEL, M.R.—Now one must consider what Wood v. Wood was, to show how different it is from this case. Wood v. Wood was in effect this: There was a rule which allowed a committee of a mutual insurance society to expel a member, and the ground was "that if the committee shall at any time deem the conduct of any member suspicious, or that such member is for any other reason unworthy of remaining in this society, they shall have full power to exclude such member." . . . No one could suppose it was to be left to the caprice of the members of the committee to stigmatise as dishonourable or dishonest any member of the society; of course it was not. It was intended that they should be satisfied by something like reasonable evidence that his conduct was unworthy. Therefore, in construing the rule, the Court of Exchequer came to the conclusion, and if I may so think, rightly came to the conclusion, that it was a case in which the committee ought not to have decided until after inquiry. That case, therefore, has no bearing upon the question as regards the partnership right to give notice to

As regards Blisset v. Daniel, that was a very peculiar case. The case was this: A majority of partners, consisting of two-thirds, wished to expel a partner, and nothing more, but if they did expel him, the other partners had a right to buy up his shares in a particular way by valuation. All the Vice-Chancellor decided was this, that in a case of that kind they had no right to expel merely for the purpose of buying up the shares, and that it was not a fair and bona fide exercise of the power. . . . How that case applies to the case of a single partner I do not well understand. In the case of several partners it may well be that it is a thing to be considered, but if it is a single partner, it is plain that neither Blisset v. Daniel nor Wood v. Wood has any application, because the moment you give the power to a single partner in terms which show that he is to be the sole judge for himself, not to acquire a benefit, but to dissolve the partnership, then he may exercise that discretion capriciously, and there is no obligation upon him to act as a tribunal, or to state the grounds on which he decides for himself. —p. 478.

LYNDHURST, L.C.—In administration under bankruptcy the joint estates and separate estates are considered as distinct estates; and accordingly it has been held, that a joint creditor, having a security upon the separate estate, is entitled to prove against the joint estate without giving up his security; on the ground that it is a different estate. LORD BLACKBURN.—The facts are but obscurely stated, but I collect that in that case the dormant partner had, by deed, given the acting partner who carried on the business the amplest authority to invest the money in any way he pleased, and he pleased to invest it by lending it to himself, to pay his private debts. That was a very wrong thing indeed; it was as Lord Eldon afterwards expressed it, an abuse of his authority—a most improper use of his authority—but he did act upon the authority. I think this is the conclusion to which Lord Thurlow came. As soon as it appeared that the partnership had authorised the partner to lend the money of the firm—not merely given him an ostensible authority to deal with the money so that it would be good as to third persons, but had actually given him an authority to lend the money, though he abused that authority, still the debt arose by a contract made with the authority of the firm, and therefore it did not come within this exception, it came within the rule.

T. 718.—C.A. COTTON, L.J.—The cases which were relied upon as showing that there is no dissolution of a partnership to work a mine when there is a bankruptcy of one of the partners, in my opinion do not lead to any such result. . . . That case [Borron, In re, Broadbent, Ex parte], in my opinion does not in any way support the proposition which has been contended for here. The Chief Judge does express an opinion that partnership to work mines in real estate must be considered as like other partnerships, and he declines to interfere; but that is because in such a case he could not grant a sale of that which was the subject of an equitable mortgage under the common order. . . . Bentley v. Bates is only a decision that the mortgagee of a share of one of the tenants in common may maintain a bill for an account against the mortgagor and his co-tenants which could not be done in an ordinary partnership. That was a decision on demurrer, and there are expressions of opinion by the judge who decided that case which favour the view; but the question really did not arise in that case, and, although the learned judge does so state, yet, in my opinion, the reasons which he gives for distinguishing a partnership in a mine from other partnerships, though true in fact, are very insufficient reasons for coming to any such conclusion as that at which he arrives.—p. 719.

MELLISH, L.J.—There there was a sort of running contract with the Postmaster-General for carrying the mails, which was liable to be terminated at a particular time, or which might last for a further time if both parties were willing; and it is obvious that in that sort of case there is a continuing contract where the consideration can be measured, and you can say what the profits for a particular time would be. In that sort of contract, then, the question was whether the survivor of two partners who had become interested in the contract was entitled to determine it, and he said that he was at liberty to go on with it or to determine it as he liked. It might be in a case of that kind that the most convenient way of judging of the rights of the deceased partner was to make a valuation of what in fact was his share of the goodwill of the contract. But where the contract is one for performing one specific work, I cannot see how it will be ascertained what the profits will be except by letting the contract be carried out, and then finding out what the profits actually are.—p. 328.

SHADWELL, V.-C.—With respect to the law of this Court upon this subject, there is no instance of an account being decreed of the profits of a partnership, on a bill which does not pray a dissolution, but contemplates the subsistence of the partnership. The opinion of Lord Eldon upon this subject has been, from time to time, STIRLING, J.—It seems to me that the decision in Tattersall v. Groote does not stand in the way of the conclusion at which I have arrived, viz., that the arbitrators [appointed under an arbitration clause in partnership articles] may take all the circumstances of the case into consideration, and, if they award a dissolution, may say what portion of the premium is to be returned.

COTTON, L.J.—The case which has been cited of Plews v. Baker . . . was very different from the present. I do not go so far as to lay down that whenever a dissolution of partnership is prayed for in an action, then the action cannot be stayed. But in this case I think that the Court is the proper tribunal to determine the matters in dispute.—p. 632.

BLACKBURN, J. (for Exchequer Chamber).—The authority of one partner to bind the firm is thus stated by Park, J. in Dickinson v. Valpy (at p. 140). "Now, undoubtedly, if there is a complete partnership between two or more persons, one partner does not communicate to the other, standing in the relation of complete partners, all authorities necessary for carrying on the partnership, and all authorities usually exercised by partners in the course of that dealing in which they are engaged": and from this it follows that, where the course of dealing is such as to make it the usual course to draw and indorse bills in the name of the firm, each partner has authority to do so for partnership purposes. But the business of attorneys is not such as to render it either necessary or usual to draw and indorse bills in the name of the firm, and therefore a member of a firm of attorneys has not, as such, authority to bind his firm, either by drawing or by indorsing bills.—p. 880.

MELLISH, L.J.—The case of The South Carolina Bank v. Case has, no doubt, been very considerably questioned by some judges since. . . . [In that case] the Court of King's Bench gave an opinion to the Court of Chancery that, under all the circumstances of that particular case, the firm in England was bound by the bills drawn in the individual name of the partner in America, on the ground that that was to be treated, notwithstanding the articles of partnership, as the name of the firm, for the purposes of the business in America. In the other case of Nicholson v. Rickitts, Crompton, J. says (at p. 527): "My only difficulty arose from the decision in The South Carolina Bank v. Case. But I think if that case is to be regarded as law, it must be on the grounds pointed out by Bayley, B., in Smith v. Craven, 1 C. & J. 500, 507. Rightly or wrongly, the Court there assumed that the facts showed an authority from the partners in England to the partner in America to bind the whole firm by contracts made by him there in his own name; that he was, in fact, a mere branch-house abroad of the house in this country." From the mode in which Crompton, J. states that, it is tolerably clear that he did not himself agree with the inference which the Court drew from all the facts in the case of The South Carolina Bank v. Case. He seems to have thought that it ought to have been determined upon what was the real agreement made by the partners inter se. However that may be, I am of opinion that this case of Nicholson v. Ricketts is a direct authority upon the question that is now before us.—p. 11.

BLACKBURN, J.—Mr. Russell appears to have gone to the jury on the ground that Miss Okell never spoke to Eaton on the subject of the loan, and to have urged, not that her silence was evidence of mala fides or of knowledge of the misapplication of the money, but that it was negligence, and the jury found that it was; but this does not entitle the defendants to the verdict, for where it is within the scope of the purposes of the partnership to borrow money, one partner has authority to borrow on behalf of the partnership, and no duty is cast upon the person advancing the money to make any further inquiries. The case of Lloyd v. Freshfield is no authority for anything of the kind for there the advance was made to the defendant Kaye on his own cheque, and the money was paid by him to the credit of his account at his private banker's, who was not the banker of the firm. The report of the motion for a new trial, in Carrington and Layne, is not very intelligible, and it differs from the report of the same case in Dowling and Ryland, in which the expressions attributed to Bayley, J. do not appear.—p. 331.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—There is no difficulty as to the law. The cases mainly relied on were Harman v. Johnson and Earl of Dundonald v. Masterman. In Harman v. Johnson, which was cited by the appellant, the law is stated as follows:—I read from the marginal note, "The receipt of money by one of a firm of attorneys from a client, professedly on behalf of the firm, for the general purpose of investing it as soon as he can meet with a good security, is not an act within the scope of the ordinary business of an attorney, so as, without further proof of authority from his partners, to render them liable to account for the money so deposited; such a transaction being part of the business of a scrivener, and attorneys, as such, not necessarily being scriveners." But though the law may be so stated, no one will deny that a course of conduct may be pursued which may convert the act of a partner, for which the other members of the firm would not be otherwise liable, into one for which they will be responsible. The other case, on which the respondents relied, was one in which that principle was acknowledged, namely, Earl of Dundonald v. Masterman, the headnote of which is as follows: "Money received by one member of a firm of solicitors in the course of the management and settlement of the affairs of a client of the firm, is money paid to the firm in the course of their professional business: and consequently the members of the firm are liable to make good any loss occasioned by the negligence or dishonesty of their partner by whom such money was received." In that case, the plaintiff being under pecuniary pressure, employed the firm in reference to arranging his affairs, and the particular sum received by the partner was received by him in the performance of the duties for which the firm was engaged.—p. 346.

SMITH, L.J. [after contrasting the facts of the two cases].—That these constitute radical differences between the two cases cannot be denied, and in my judgment Cleather v. Twisden, which the learned judges who decided it in this Court declared to be a case upon the border line, by no means governs the present. . . . It is clear from the last passage in the judgment of Fry, L.J. in Cleather v. Twisden that the learned judge, even upon the facts proved in that case, was of opinion that if the bonds had been deposited with Parker upon firm's business, the firm would have been responsible.—pp. 129, 130.

MALINS, V.-C.—I am of opinion, with great respect for the late Master of the Rolls, that either the decision of Atkinson v. Mackreth must be considered to have proceeded upon its special circumstances, or it cannot be brought within the settled rules of the Court. In my opinion, where there is a joint and several liability, all or any of the parties liable may be sued without joining the remainder. So it was decided, as I consider, positively, in Gray v. Lewis (L. R. 18 Eq. 526), but inferentially also in St. Aubyn v. Smart (L. R. 5 Eq. 183; Ibid. 3 Ch. 646), where a fund had been misapplied by one of two solicitors carrying on business in partnership, and in a suit against the other partner alone he was made liable to repay it.—p. 627.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—It appears to me that the authorities cited by the counsel for the appellant only establish the proposition that, where a liability arises from the instrument only, the extent of the obligation must be measured by the terms of the instrument only, and *Wilmer v. COTTON, L.J.—In Steward v. Blakeway it was held that, although part of the property was used for the purpose of the partnership, yet it was not to be considered as converted from real estate into personal estate. . . . They agreed to hold it as real estate in which they were to be co-owners, not to hold it as part of their joint stock to be sold when the partnership was put an end to and had to be wound-up. In my opinion, therefore, that case cannot prevent the consequences of what I think is the true inference to be drawn from the evidence we have before us.—p. 203.

LINDLEY, M.R.—But if you come to the conclusion (about which there can be no doubt) that the goodwill, apart from the benefit of the firm name, as to which nothing is said, was not to be sold, but was to be divided between the partners, what is the result? It appears to me to follow that each partner could use the name of the old firm. They had become tenants in common of that asset, and each partner was entitled to enjoy that asset . . . I cannot see any legal answer to this position, and this I think explains the decision of Lord Romilly, M.R., in Banks v. Gibson, and clearly distinguishes the present case from Gray v. Smith (infra, col. 2050) and the other cases which have been cited.

COTTON, L.J.—Levy v. Walker does not apply to the present case. There Levy could not have been subjected to any liability by the continued use of the name of the old firm—it did not include his name; moreover, there was in that case an SELBORNE, L.C.—I should hold, therefore, on principle that no interest is, after dissolution, payable between partners merely on the ground that they have still remaining in the concern unequal shares of capital, on which during the continuance of the partnership they were entitled, either by express agreement, or by their course of dealing, to have interest credited either with or without rests. The authorities, with the one exception (Pilling v. Pilling), seem to me to be in accordance with this view. . . . If Pilling v. Pilling, decided in 1865, is not to be explained by any special circumstances, it seems right to observe that it was decided, in the first instance, by the judge whose later decision in Watney v. Wells was affirmed by Lord Chelmsford, and by the same Lords Justices who afterwards in 1866 decided Wood v. Scoles. In Smith v. Donaldson (2 Dec. in Court of Session, 3rd Series), the advances on which interest (with rests) was allowed were made to a dissolved partnership for the purpose of its liquidation; and a binding agreement for the allowance of such interest was held to be established.—p. 5.

HALL, V.-C.—I should say with reference to Watney v. Wells, the arguments which were addressed to the Court in that case upon the state of the assets, were such as rather to show that it was thought not improbable that giving back to each partner his capital with its accumulations would or might pretty nearly exhaust the whole fund. It does not at all appear from the report whether the mode of division of the surplus profits was thought worth consideration. I do not think that I can regard that decision as a considered judgment at all upon that part of the case, or as standing in the way of the view which I think ought to be taken as to the principle to be adopted in a case like the present with reference to the division of profits in a business partnership carried on after the decease of one of the partners by the surviving partner.—p. 191.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—In David v. Ellice no bill of exchange was given, and that decision, on consideration, is not altogether satisfactory to us. We cannot but think that there was abundant evidence to go to a jury (and upon which the Court might have decided), of the payment of the old debt by Inglis, Ellice & Co., to the plaintiff, and a new loan to the new firm; which might have been as well effected by a transfer of account by mutual consent as by actual payment of money.—p. 933.

HALL, V.-C.—Moreover the proof in the bankruptcy was solely against the estates of Woodhead and Joseph Holmes, and was not, as in Harris v. Farwell, "for money had and received to and for the use of" the creditors, but was for "money lent and advanced" to the bankrupt. This is in my opinion quite sufficient to show, without any renewal of the deposit notes, an acceptance of the liability of the bankrupts, and a release of the former members of the firm. This distinguishes the case from Harris v. Farwell.—p. 448.

THESEMER, L.J.—It is unnecessary to go through the numerous cases which were cited during the argument, but it will be right to refer to the cases of The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Walker, and Jacomb v. Harwood, as in those cases judgments recovered against some of several partners were held not to be a bar to proceedings in equity against the estate of a deceased partner. But in each of those cases the judgment was not recovered until after the death of the partner against whose estate the creditor was seeking relief; and the cases in which relief has been given in equity against the estate of a deceased partner, certainly establish that from and after his death his estate is subject to a separate or several liability.

COTTON, L.J.—I refer to it [the above case] merely because it was quoted as sanctioned by the opinion of Lindley, L.J. in his book on Partnership (5th ed. p. 141). . . . When one looks at the case one finds this, that the judges who decided it decided that in the business of bankers it was so ordinary to take shares in companies as a security for a debt that it was part of the implied contract between them; but then James, L.J. points out that in fact all the partners assented to this being done. I rather think that Lord Justice Lindley's statement here has been a little misunderstood. . . . I cannot think that he intended to lay down as a general rule of law that that could be done which was done in Weikert's Case, on the ground that the judges held in that case that a partner in a bank would have that implied authority, though they really decided it on the ground that in that particular case the partners had known and assented to what was done.—p. 224.

WESTBURY, L.C.—It was said by Lord Ellenborough in this case, that the object of requiring a specification to be enrolled seemed to be, to enable persons of reasonable intelligence and skill in the subject-matter to tell from the inspection of the specification itself what the invention was for which the patent was granted. It is true that the case of Harmar v. Playne was held to be an exception to this rule, but exceptio probat regulam. In that case a patent was taken out for a machine; the inventor afterwards discovered an improvement, and took out a second patent for an improved machine, and in the specification of that second patent he described the whole machine, without distinguishing the improvement, and the objection was that the specification was insufficient, and the patent bad; but inasmuch as in the second patent he had recited the first patent and the specification under it, it was held, that the recital being in immediate comparison with the new specification, furnished in gremio of the new patent the means of distinguishing the new from the old.—p. 312.

JAMES, L.J. (for the Court).—I will state what we conceive to be the real principle which underlies the case of Lister v. Leather, and which reconciles it with the other cases, and with general principles and common sense. A patent for a new combination or arrangement is to be entitled to the same protection, and on the same principles, as every other patent. In fact every or almost every patent is a patent for a new combination. The patent is for the entire combination, but there is or may be an essence or substance of the invention underlying the mere accidents of form; and that invention, like every other invention, may be pirated by a theft in a disguised or mutilated form, and it will be in every case a question of fact whether the alleged piracy is the same in substance and effect, or is a substantially new or different combination.—p. 231.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—Of course Harmar v. Playne was decided long before Foxwell v. Bostock, and it might be open to consideration whether different views prevailed in Foxwell v. Bostock from those which prevailed when Harmar v. Playne was decided; but I think there is so much good sense and justice in the doctrines established by Harmar v. Playne that it is not a case which ought to be easily impeached by a later decision (p. 37). It is said that, according to the doctrine of Lister v. Leather (supra), if there is a patent for a combination of parts free from the vice of mixing up old and new parts, so that a person cannot distinguish the one from the other, as was the case in Foxwell v. Bostock, then other makers are not entitled to take that which is new.—p. 38.

JAMES, L.J.—Perhaps I ought, before parting with the case, to refer to the observations of the Vice-Chancellor (Bacon, V.-C., see p. 578, n.), that the plaintiff's specification is not sufficient upon the principles laid down by Lord Westbury in Foxwell v. Bostock. I had occasion to deal with an objection grounded on Foxwell v. Bostock in the case of Parkes v. Stevens (L. R. 8 Eq. 358), and I refer to what I said in that case, because I find it was in substance approved of and affirmed by the Lord Chancellor on appeal. I there said, . . . "After all, the question of sufficiency of specification is not a question of law, it is a question really of fact in each particular case. In this case I am of opinion that the patentee has a right to have his specification of 1865 read with his specification of 1862, and, reading them together, I do not think any maker of lamps would have any substantial difficulty in ascertaining what was claimed under the general description of the arrangement and combination of parts hereinbefore described and represented in the drawings annexed." Accordingly upon the issue of the validity of the patent, and the sufficiency of the specification, I found for the plaintiff, although I found for the defendant upon the question of infringement. Both sides appealed, and the present Lord Chancellor, in his judgment, says: "As to the validity of his second patent, which has been disputed, there is a clear line marking off the old from the new" (the objection was that the plaintiff had taken out two patents, each of them for improvements in the same direction, and in the same terms, and that he did not say which part was covered by the old as distinguished from the new), "in a manner which could not be mistaken by anybody properly understanding the English language, and no one would be obliged to have recourse to further investigation (which was the ground of the decision in Foxwell v. Bostock), in order to know what parts he might take, and what parts he might not take under each patent. I think, therefore, that there is no objection to the specification on that ground."—p. 585.

Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co. (1876) 1 App. Cas. 574.—H.L. (SC.).

LORD CAIRNS.—The first is an objection said to be founded upon the case of Foxwell v. Bostock decided by the late Lord Westbury when Lord Chancellor. It is said to have been determined in that case that where there is a patent for a combination there must be a discovery or explanation of the novelty, and the specification must show what is the novelty, and what the merit of the invention. I cannot think that, as applied to a patent for a combination, this is, or was meant to be, the effect of the decision in Foxwell v. Bostock. If there is a patent for a combination, the combination itself is, ex necessitate, the novelty; and the combination is also the merit, if it be a merit, which remains to be proved by evidence. So also with regard to the discrimination between what is new and what is old. If it is clear that the claim is for a combination, and nothing but a combination, there is no infringement unless the whole combination is used, and it is in that way immaterial whether any or which of the parts are new.—p. 577.

COTTON, L.J.—What was relied on by the counsel for Bennis was the opinion expressed by Lord Westbury in Foxwell v. Bostock. But that must be read with the light thrown upon it by the option expressed in the House of Lords by Lord Cairns in Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co.

COTTON, L.J.—... The principle which was contended for [as having been laid down in Curtis v. Platt] was this, that where there is a combination claimed for improvements in machinery, there you must hold the patentee strictly to the description which he gives of the particular means by which his invention is to be carried into effect, and that the doctrine of mechanical equivalents cannot apply in such a case, but you must hold him strictly to the particular mechanical means by which he proposes to carry out his invention. Now, in my opinion that case does not apply to this, because those observations were applied to a case where there was a machine which had been long in use for producing a certain result, and, therefore, there was no novelty at all in the result to be produced even in that machine, and the only novelty which there could be claimed would be the application and use of certain mechanical means in order to produce in a known machine the same result which in that known machine had been produced by other mechanical means. That to my mind distinguishes the case entirely from the present. . . Here the throwing coal on to the furnace by the intermittent radial action of a flap or door was new, and nothing of the kind had been done before.—pp. 19, 20.

MALINS, V.-C.—The case relied on is Ex parte Fox, where Lord Eldon laid down the rule that the specification must be complied with, irrespective of the drawing; and if not the patent is bad. Now, of course I should be most reluctant to suppose that anything laid down by Lord Eldon was wrong, but I confess, although that was the rule then, the great improvements of science since that time, as instanced by the inventions of locomotives, electric telegraphs, &c., have made it impossible that it can be now adhered to. Look at any of these modern inventions, they are utterly unintelligible, even to a skilful engineer, without the drawings; and, therefore it is not surprising that that rule can be no longer the law. A specification may consist of figures or one figure only; or it may consist of a description aided by the figure or figures. [The Vice-Chancellor then referred to Coryton on Patents, 140.] That rule, therefore, is no longer a rule, and a specification may be good although it consists of a drawing only.—p. 699.

LINDLEY, L.J.—But the cases of Patterson v. Gas Light Co., Oxley v. Holden, Bush v. Fox, and Betts v. Menzies, not to mention others, show that what is material in these cases is to consider what was disclosed to the public in the earlier specifications. In order to show that a patentee is not the true and first inventor of his patented invention, it is not necessary to show that he learned it from a prior publication existing in this country. It is sufficient to show that the invention was so described in some book or document published in this country, that some English people may be fairly supposed to have known of it. This is the result of Househill Co. v. Neilson, Stead v. Williams, and Lang v. Gisborne. Plimpton v. Malcolmson and Plimpton v. Spiller are not opposed to this view of the law, for in those cases there was evidence which satisfied the Court that the one copy in this country relied on as a prior publication had not in fact been laid before the public, and was not in fact known to exist. It is necessary next to consider the effect of any of these specifications being in German and not in English. The fact that German is understood by many people in this country and that persons who can read and translate German can easily be found by those who want their assistance, must, I think, be treated as common knowledge and be judicially noticed, although not stated in the special case. . . . The fact that Heurteloup's Patent requires confirmation goes far to show that it would have been invalid unless confirmed under the provisions of the statute in question. Regarded from this point of view Heurteloup's Patent, so far as it goes, is in favour of the defendant, rather than of the plaintiffs. Lang v. Gishorne contains an emphatic expression of opinion by Lord Romilly to the effect that there is no distinction between a publication in this country of a description in the French language and a description in English. Some remarks made by Lord Brougham and Lord Campbell have been relied upon as inconsistent with Lord Romilly's view, but I do not so understand them. They merely go to show that a foreign publication not known in England will not invalidate a patent. —pp. 467, 468.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The case of Neilson v. Betts most undoubtedly decided the general principle that, upon a decree against a party for the infringement of a patent, the patentee is not entitled both to an account of profits and an inquiry into damages. That principle applies generally and without any distinction at all.

JESSEL, M.R.—[At page 510 explains Lang v. Gishorne at length.] I should have thought independently of authority, that no prior description ought to invalidate a patent unless a person of ordinary skill in the particular trade could make the thing from the description. But it has been alleged that something less will do. As I read the authorities, that is not so. The question has been before the House of Lords in the case of Neilson v. Betts (infra), and the judgments of Lord Westbury and Lord Colonsay in that case both amount to this, that the description in the book must be equivalent to a specification. I may add that this is entirely in accordance with the case of Hills v. Evans (4 De Gex, F. & J. 288; 31 L. J. Ch. 357), and the case of Betts v. Menzies (10 H. L. Cas. 117; 31 L. J. Ch. 233), and even if I differed from them, which I do not, I should be bound by these decisions.—p. 512.

PEARSON, J.—In Plimpton v. Malcolmson, Sir George Jessel, in commenting upon Heurteloup's Patent, says this in reference to a book relied upon in Heurteloup's Patent as an anticipation:—"I have no doubt that that book was in the British Museum catalogues. Of course I cannot say it was"—in this case it was proved that it was. "We know that after two years it would have been in the catalogue, and, in fact, long before; and there was nothing to show that it was not read or used, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption was the other way," by which I understood Sir George Jessel to have said that, if there be a book in the British Museum, the presumption is that it has been read. I find it very difficult indeed to go along with Sir George Jessel in that presumption. I do not know the authority for it. He gives no authority for it. And the point was not raised by Plimpton v. Malcolmson, where there was no copy in the British Museum and no copy sufficiently published elsewhere.—p. 245.

CAIRNS, L.C.—I do not say that I wish to unsettle the decision in Ex parte Bates and Redgate, but I think that it is open to reconsideration (p. 393). . . . If this case were like the case of Ex parte Bates and Redgate I should certainly have hesitated for some time before I acted in opposition to that decision, considering the authority by whom that case was decided, and that that decision has been followed in subsequent cases. I may, however, state my objections to that decision, which I never could thoroughly understand. It has always seemed to me that if Parliament held out to inventors the advantage they should get from provisional protection, the inventor should have the enjoyment of that advantage for the six months granted to him. Parliament intended the six months to be for the completion of the invention, and for perfecting the specification, and never said that the applicant should be deprived of or lose that advantage by want of any due diligence on his part. The applicant was told that for six months he was to some extent secure. It always seemed to me that if a man applies on, say the 1st of May, for a patent, and another applies on, say the 1st of June, for a patent for the same thing, and the second applicant obtains the Great Seal first, it is very hard to deprive the applicant of the 1st of May of the benefit of his invention. It appears to me very like a breach of contract with the first inventor to give a subsequent applicant an advantage because the latter has outrun him, and a very hard thing upon him. However, the case before me is not like the case of Ex parte Bates and Redgate.—p. 395.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In the face, therefore, of that 26th section [of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883] it appears to me that if upon the true construction of the two specifications [i.e., the provisional and the complete specification] they are not for the same invention, the patent cannot be upheld, and that is the view taken by Lord Halsbury at all events in the case of Vickers v. Siddell. . . . That appears to me, I confess, to be the view which is most in accordance with the sections of the Act to which I have referred. It is a view in no way dissented from by the other learned law lords, although they abstain from expressing a positive opinion upon it. It is also quite consistent with the view taken by this Court in the same case when it was before the Court, because every member of the Court left that particular point of law open for further discussion. —p. 96.

KAY, J.—This case differs from the Fusce Vesta Case in this respect, that in the Fusce Vesta Case very little had been done; but here I am told that the pleadings are completed, and that nothing remains but to prepare the evidence and bring the case on for trial.—p. 245.

[The motion was by the plaintiffs in an action for infringement for leave to amend their specification by striking out the second claim thereof; and the order made was as follows: Application granted. The plaintiffs to pay the costs of the application, and the costs of and occasioned by the disclaimer. The plaintiffs and defendants to be allowed to make all necessary amendments in their proceedings after disclaimer. The plaintiffs to undertake forthwith to amend their pleadings, confining the action to the specification as amended by the disclaimer, or to consent to the action being dismissed with costs. In the event of trial all other questions of costs reserved.]

STIRLING, J.—I was also referred to Gaulard and Gibbs' Patent, In re, in which an application was made for leave to amend by way of disclaimer—the disclaimer being really the excision of claim 3 of the specification; and upon that, in the same way as was allowed by the law officer in Lang's Patent, In re, certain portions of the body of the specification were allowed to be struck out or altered. These cases do not, in my opinion, help the present applicant [who desired an amendment by way of correction]. The very point, however, appears to have been present to the mind of Chitty, L.J. in Yates v. Armstrong, Armstrong's Patent, In re (infra). There, in dealing with an argument which had been addressed to the Court, he said: "The amendment that could be made, even if leave were granted, would merely be by way of disclaimer, that being clear under sect. 18 (and also under sect. 19), which uses the three terms, and shows that the term 'disclaimer,' which alone occurs in sect. 19, is so used advisedly." Therefore it appears to have been the opinion of the lord justice in that case that the word "disclaimer" in sect. 19 should not receive the extended meaning which is sought to be attached to it here, and that only an application for leave to amend by way of disclaimer ought to be granted. . . . That is the conclusion to which, independently of authority, I myself should have come.—p. 66.

JERVIS, C.J.—What is the proper construction to be put upon the first section of the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 83. . . . But for the case of Perry v. Skinner I should have thought upon reading the clause in question, that the plain and obvious intention of the legislature was to allow a specification to be amended at any time by a disclaimer, and to provide, that, when such disclaimer should be perfected, due precautions being taken by the law officers of the crown, and such terms being imposed as they in their discretion shall think right, it should be deemed and taken to be, for all purposes, part of the original specification, except in the case of actions pending at the time of the filing of such disclaimer. If that be not the true meaning of the Act, it seems to me that the proviso "that no such disclaimer shall be receivable in evidence in any action or suit (save and except in any proceeding by scire facias) pending at the time when such disclaimer was inrolled." will be totally inoperative: because, if the construction put by the Court of Exchequer in Perry v. Skinner, upon the previous words be the correct one, then, inasmuch as the disclaimer is to be deemed and taken to be part of the letters patent, or of the specification, only "from thenceforth," that is, from the time of its inrolment, the proviso that it shall not be receivable in evidence in any action pending at the time of the inrolment, would be idle. I think, therefore, that, upon the true construction of the Act, the disclaimer is to be read as part of the specification, as from the time when the patent is granted. And I am warranted by my experience in these matters in saying, that no practical injustice or inconvenience can result from this construction.—p. 389.

JESSEL, M.R.—There are two cases before Vice-Chancellor Malins, which I am afraid have led to this action. The first is the case of Rollins v. Hinks. The Vice-Chancellor there lays down this proposition—that there is no presumption at law in favour of the validity of a patent. . . . I must first of all observe that Wren v. Weild (L. R. 4 Q. B. 730), was cited before the Vice-Chancellor, and there the judges had held that that was not so, because they proceeded on the assumption that as the patent had not been set aside by scire facias it must be taken to be a good bonâ fide patent (p. 520). . . . The Vice-Chancellor's judgment is therefore founded on a proposition of law which I think is not sound. I have no doubt that a patent is primâ facie good as long as it stands, and the person who alleges it is not good must prove it. Then the Vice-Chancellor says:—"The rule is, that where letters patent have been recently granted, an injunction will not be granted till the right has been established." That is not quite correct either. . . . What the Vice-Chancellor said in Asmann v. Lund was this:—"The defendant declines to undertake to take proceedings at law to establish the validity of the patent, and I retain the opinion I expressed in Rollins v. Hinks—that, as he will not follow up the rights he asserts by proceeding to establish the validity of the patent, he ought to be restrained from circulating threats." But it does not appear to me that that is a ground for restraining the defendant. The question really is, whether the mere fact of a man threatening another that he will take proceedings for infringement is a ground for injunction, when he asserts there is an infringement. I think it is quite plain that it is not. The real point, I think, that the Vice-Chancellor intended to decide in Asmann v. Lund was that the assertion by the defendant of his rights was not bonâ fide.—p. 521.

COTTON, L.J.—In my opinion where the words [of sect. 32 of the Patents Act, 1883] are, as I read them, that the Court must be satisfied "that the act complained of is not in fact an infringement of any legal right of the person making such threats," the question whether the patent of the person making the threats is a valid patent must come into consideration if the plaintiff in the action seeks it, because I cannot see how, if a patent is invalid, there can be any act done in infringement of a legal right when the legal right depends only on the validity of that patent. I mention that because, as I understand, although the case is not before us on appeal, Chitty, J. [in Kurtz v. Spence] has intimated an opinion that the question of the validity of the patent could not come in question in an action like this. In my opinion—and I am bound to state it after the discussion we have had—it could, and in order that the Court may be satisfied whether there is or is not an infringement of any legal right, one of the questions must be, not only whether the instrument complained of is one which is an infringement of the patent if valid, but, if the plaintiff likes to raise the question, whether the patent is or is not valid.—pp. 1001, 1002.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have read or had read to us, the judgment of Bowen, L.J. in that case, and, speaking subject to one qualification (which I will mention presently), it appears to me that the construction put by the learned judge on that section is right. I cannot suppose that the section prevents a patentee from saying that which the patent itself implies—that anybody infringing must expect legal proceedings to be taken against him. I do not think it can mean that. That is merely saying what everybody knows already. That is not a threat against anybody in particular. The Lord Justice went on to say as I understand him, that he doubted whether this section would apply unless there had been an actual infringement. I should like to qualify that a little by saying that I think, upon the true construction of this section, the section might apply to an intended infringement, provided that you could make out that the intended infringement, if carried out, would be an actual infringement.

JAMES, L.J. (for the Court).—We are of opinion that the evidence [the specification of certain American patents] is clearly inadmissible for the purpose of construing the specification of the particular patent before us. The admissibility was put on some expressions in the judgment of the learned judges in the case of Trotman v. Wood, relating to Trotman's anchors. They are only dicta, because no such evidence was acted on in that case. It was never meant by the learned judges, and it cannot be effectually contended that there is any principle to be applied to the construction of specifications which differs from that applicable to the construction of any written instrument whatever.—p. 142.

COTTON, L.J.—As I have already stated, I think that Kekewich, J. misapplied that judgment [the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in the above case]. Lord Macnaghten was dealing with an entirely different case. He was not dealing with a case where the defendants were manufacturing an article which could only be made by the plaintiffs; but where they were manufacturing a thing which the plaintiffs had particular machinery for making; and there was in the market a competition of nails very similar to those which the plaintiffs made more cheaply by their machinery; and the defendants had been making a good many of these nails, and selling them, using the machinery for which the plaintiffs had a patent. But the plaintiffs had not merely followed the lead of the defendants in reducing their prices, they had always gone a little before the defendants in reducing their prices, and had reduced their prices below those at which the defendants were selling. . . . In my opinion therefore, that opinion was not one applicable to this case. There the plaintiffs were seeking to get as damages from the defendants the loss which they had sustained by their own action, which is entirely different from what was done here, because here it is found (and it was not so found by the Lord Ordinary in the case in question) that the plaintiffs would have sold all that had been sold at the original prices if it had not been for the wrongful acts of the defendants.—pp. 433, 434.

COTTON, L.J.—That section (s. 43 of the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852) is not in its terms binding in the Court of the County Palatine, but it is urged that it ought to be considered binding by way of analogy, when a Court of equity decides legal questions under Lord Cairns' Act or Sir John Rolfe's Act. Honiball v. Bloomer was relied on as deciding that, where there has been no such trial as to enable the judge to say that the objections are proved, the costs cannot be allowed. We need not determine whether that decision was right or wrong; we only say that we must not be considered as expressing our approval of it.—p. 328.

Their lordships desire it to be understood that that case is not to be considered as laying down any general rule of law. . . . Their lordships are of opinion that where the question to be considered is, whether an invention has been sufficiently remunerative or not in taking into consideration the remuneration received, they must have regard to the remuneration which the invention has brought in to the patentee, or the person who claims the right of the patentee, whether it be in one country or another.—p. 82.

JAMES, L.J. (for J.C.).—But their lordships have for their guidance principles laid down by their predecessors at this board, and they conceive it to be of vital importance in dealing with applications of this kind to adhere to any principle once clearly established. In a recent case (Saxby's Patent) it was laid down by this board in a judgment delivered by Lord Cairns thus:—"It is the habit of this tribunal to consider whether the invention brought before them is one of that high degree of merit which, if everything else were satisfactory, would entitle the patentee to a prolongation. But in the present case, as I have already stated, their lordships propose to deal with that which is at the very threshold of the case, the question of accounts. Now it is the duty of every patentee who comes for the prolongation of his patent to take upon himself the onus of satisfying this tribunal in a manner which admits of no controversy, what has been the amount of remuneration which, in every point of view, the invention has brought to him in order that their lordships may be able to come to a conclusion, whether that remuneration may fairly be considered a sufficient reward for his invention or not. It is not for this committee to send back the accounts for further particulars, nor to dissect the accounts for the purpose of surmising what might be their real outcome if they were differently cast. It is for the applicant to bring his accounts before the committee in a shape which will leave no doubt as to what the remuneration has been that he has received." Their lordships entirely concur in, and feel themselves bound by, this decision.—p. 425.

Marshall's Patent (1891) [1891] A. C. 430.—P.C. LORDS WATSON, HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN

and HANNEN, SIR RICHARD COUCH and LORD SHAND.

LORD WATSON.—The petitioner in this case referred to and relied on the judgment of this board in Brandon's Patent as an authority in his favour to this extent, that his patent is not within the provisions of the recent Act of 1883, and that he has the right to apply for a renewal which is conferred upon patentees by older legislation. In no other respect is this case on all fours with Brandon's Case: it differs from that case and Jabluchkoff's Patent in this respect, that in those cases the patentee was in a position to prosecute his application with effect before the patent expired. That result in the circumstances of the present case is plainly impossible, because the petition was presented to the registrar on the very day on which the patent came to its natural end.—pp. 430, 431.

7. ASSIGNMENT AND LICENCE.

Société Anonyme des Manufactures de Glaces v. Tilghman's Patent Sand Blast Company (1883) 25 Ch. D. 1; 53 L. J. Ch. 1; 49 L. T. 451; 32 W. R. 71.—C.A. COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ.

COTTON, L.J.—A case was referred to which it was said Pearson, J. would have acted upon but for the point which was relied on, viz., that in respect of the Belgian patent the defendants were agents only, whereas they were owners of the English patent. That was the case of Betts v. Willmot, which I think would not be an authority for what the plaintiffs are here contending for. In that case the owners of the English and foreign patents had sold abroad things manufactured in a foreign country. In my opinion the licence to use a patented invention under a foreign patent stands in a very different position from the sale of an article manufactured under either a foreign or an English patent. When an article is sold without any restriction on the buyer, whether it is manufactured under one or the other patent, that, in my opinion, as against the vendor gives the purchaser an absolute right to deal with that which he so buys in any way he thinks fit, and of course that includes selling in any country where there is a patent in the possession of and owned by the vendor. Here, as is pointed out, it is simply a licence to manufacture.—p. 9.

Guyot v. Thomson (1894) 64 L. J. Ch. 32; [1894] 3 Ch. 388; 8 L. 810, 814, n.; 71 L. T. 124, 416.—ROMER, J.; affirmed, C.A.

ROMER, J., on its being pointed out in argument that in Ward v. Livesey it was held that a licence under seal was forfeited on breach of the terms on which it was granted, asked how he could say that the licence in the case before him was revocable when a lump sum had been paid down for the exclusive use of the patented invention, and it was held both by him and by the C.A. that the licence was not revocable at the will of the patentee.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that Clayton's Case cannot be applied to fraudulent items.

MELLISH, L.J.—Suppose a partner fraudulently draws out 20,000*l.*, and then draws out nearly 10,000*l.*, more, which he enters in the books, so that it is a simple overdrawing without fraud. He then pays in 30,000*l.* It is contended that he has repaid the 20,000*l.*, and that unless he makes further fraudulent overdrawings there is no right of proof against his separate estate. But suppose he openly draws 30,000*l.* out again, the firm is cheated of the 20,000*l.* just as much as if he had never paid in the 30,000*l.* I am of opinion, therefore, that Clayton's Case cannot be applied to fraudulent debts of this nature.—p. 554.

SALBORNE, L.C.—The principle of Clayton's Case, and of the other cases which deal with the same subject, is this, that where a creditor having a right to appropriate moneys paid to him generally, and not specifically appropriated by the person paying them, carries them into a particular account kept in his books, he prima facie appropriates them to that account, and the effect of that is, that the payments are de facto appropriated according to the priority in order of the entries on the one side and on the other of that account.—p. 702.

HALSBURY, L.C.—The rule in Clayton's Case is a very sound rule in cases such as that in which it was first applied, but here the circumstances are entirely different. The whole fund here consists of money not borrowed by the defendant from his clients, but received by him as agent for them, and therefore for the present purpose may be treated as trust money. Now as between cestuis que trust the rule is applicable, but it cannot be applied here, because no question arises between the different cestuis que trust. The question arises between them and a person who claims under a judgment against their trustee.

The Mecca (1897) 66 L. J. P. 86; [1897] A. C. 286; 46 L. T. 579; 572; 45 W. R. 667; 8 Asp. M. C. 266.—H.L. (E.); reversing C.A.; which affirmed BRUCE, J.

HALSBURY, L.C.—It is said that the account last referred to brings the question within the authority of Clayton's Case; and, in order to see whether this is so, it is necessary to consider what Clayton's Case was, and the reasons given by Sir W. Grant, who decided it. That learned judge says: Where an account current is kept between parties as a trading account, "there is no room for any other appropriation than that which arises from the order in which the receipts and payments take place and are carried into the account. Presumably, it is the sum first paid in that is first drawn out. It is the first item on the debit side of the account that is discharged or reduced by the first item on the credit side. The appropriation is made by the very act of setting the two items against each other." This rule, so formulated, has been adopted in all the Courts in Westminster Hall—see Field v. Carr (1828) 6 L. J. (O.S.) C. P. 203; 5 Bing. 13. It is to be remembered, however, that on more than one occasion it has been pointed out that this is not an invariable rule of law; but the circumstances of a case may afford ground for inferring that transactions of the parties were not so intended as to come under this general rule; . . . I think this case is not within the rule at all. This is not an account current; there is no setting one item against another; credit is given for the 900*l.* at the end of all the items. They are all separate transactions, and, although on one piece of paper, seem to represent only historically the transactions as they occurred. How the principle of Sir W. Grant's decision can apply to two transactions of identically the same date, I cannot understand. There is in respect of these items no earlier date—it is the mere fact that one precedes the other in its place on the paper. I think it would be extremely inconvenient in business to draw inferences from the shape or order of accounts, and I think would be an altogether novel application of a principle which has been established so long that I should feel great reluctance to engraft a new application upon it.—p. 88.

GIFFARD, L.J.—H. had an account of his own at Messrs. D.'s, and this sum (5,000*l.*) was paid to his general account on the 29th October, 1868. After that the account goes on in the ordinary way of bankers' accounts; and supposing this sum of 5,000*l.* were not trust money, it is clear that it was drawn out again and again. It was argued that the case of Pennell v. Deffell does not decide that in such a case trust money is to be treated like an ordinary sum, and some observations of Knight Bruce, L.J. were referred to as tending to prove that this case was like money placed by a trustee in a chest; but if we look at the words of the lords justices in that case, there can be no doubt as to the effect of the decision. There can be no question that at law, as between a banker and his customer, the debt is extinguished by the first payments made, and it would be an extraordinary thing if the debt could be in existence in equity when it is extinguished at law.—p. 766.

JESSEL, M.R.—Now when we come to look at the case which was before Fry, J., the case of Dale & Co., Ex parte, we shall find him saying this: "Does it make any difference that instead of trustee and cestui que trust it is a case of fiduciary relationship? What is a fiduciary relationship? It is one in respect of which if a wrong arise, the same remedy exists against the wrongdoer on behalf of the principal as would exist against a trustee on behalf of the cestui que trust. If that be a just description of the relationship, it would follow that wherever fiduciary relationship exists, and money coming from the trust lies in the hands of persons standing in that relationship, it can be followed and separated from any money of their own. That seems to be the logical result of Pennell v. Deffell." Up to that point I agree with every syllable, and I think it would be impossible to express the doctrine more clearly than it is there expressed by Fry, J. But now comes the unfortunate result, "but that result is opposed to the long line of authorities to which I have referred, and from which I do not feel myself justified upon any reasoning of my own in departing." So he here decided the case wrongly and against his own opinion and against the case of Pennell v. Deffell in deference to a long line of authorities. That being so, I feel bound to examine his supposed long line of authorities, which are not very numerous, and show that not one of them lends any support whatever to the doctrine or principle which he thinks is established by them.—p. 419. [His lordship considered in detail the cases referred to and continued:] I think after those authorities it must now be considered settled that there is no distinction, and never was a distinction between a person occupying one fiduciary position or another fiduciary position as to the right of the beneficial owner to follow the trust fund, and that those cases which have been cited at law so far from establishing a distinction, establish the contrary, and that the mere error of supposing that equity could not follow or distinguish money in the cases supposed, if error it was, and perhaps it was not so originally . . . is attributable really to the fact that the judges who followed the earlier cases were not aware of what I may call the gradual refinement of the doctrine of equity.—p. 423.

There it was proved that all the moneys which had been paid into the stockbroker's banking account were moneys of his clients, and that he had paid to or for all his clients the moneys which he had received for them respectively, except in the case of the four clients who were claiming the balance at his banker's. That case was as different as possible from the present case, where it is proved that the claimant's money has been drawn out of the account. The claim must be disallowed.—p. 436.

Wallis v. Smith (1882) 21 Ch. D. 243; 52 L. J. Ch. 145; 47 L. T. 389; 31 W. R. 214.—C.A. JESSEL, M.R., COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ.
JESSEL, M.R.—Now I have to consider (and I am afraid at some length) what the decisions are. I think they may be classed in this way. There is a series of decisions beginning—I do not say actually beginning, but beginning for this purpose—with Astley v. Weldon, which purports to be founded on older authority and ending with the case in the Appeal Court of In re Newman (infra, col. 2104), in which this has been determined—that where a sum of money is stated to be payable either by way of liquidated damages, or by way of penalty for breach of stipulations, all or some of which are, or one of which is, for the payment of a sum of money of less amount, that is really as penalty, and you can only recover the actual damage, and the Court will not sever the stipulations. If any one of the stipulations is for the payment of the sum of money of less amount, then the proviso is bad. The ground of that doctrine I do not know. The ground stated by the judges in two or three of the cases is this—they say it was an extension to the common law of the well-known doctrine of equity. I do know a little of equity, but I am sorry to say I cannot assent to the accuracy of the statement that it is an extension to the common law of the well-known doctrine. However that is the ground put by the judges. Another ground may be put—I do not find it put anywhere, but it may be put—and there are some expressions which, though I do not say they amount to what I am about to say, tend that way; and that is the well-known doctrine, that in the construction of written instruments, you may depart from the written meaning of the words, if reading the words literally leads to an absurdity (p. 256). The next class of cases is this. It is a class of cases in which the amount of damages is not ascertainable per se, but in which the amount of damages for a breach of one or more of the stipulations either must be small, or will, in all human probability, be small—that is, where it is not absolutely necessary that they should be small; but it is so near to a necessity, having regard to the probabilities of the case, that the Court will presume it to be so. Then the question is, whether, in that class of cases, the same rule applies? Now, upon this, there is no decision. There are a great many dicta upon the question, and a great many dicta on each side. I do not think it necessary to express a final opinion in this case; but I do say this, that the Court is not bound by the dicta on either side, and the case is open to discussion. It is within the principle, if principle it be, of a larger sum being a penalty for non-payment of a smaller sum: but at the same time it is also within another class of cases, to which I am now going to call attention. The class of cases to which I refer is that in which the damages for the breach of each stipulation are unascertainable, or not readily ascertainable, but the stipulations may be of greater or less importance, or they may be of equal importance. There are dicta there which seem to say that if they vary much in importance the principle of which I have been speaking applies, but there is no decision. On the contrary, all the reported cases are decisions the other way; although the stipulations have varied in importance, the sum has always been treated as liquidated damages. I now come to the last class of cases. There is a class of cases relating to deposits. Where a deposit is to be forfeited for the breach of a number of stipulations, some of which may be trifling, some of which may be for the payment of money on a given day, in all those cases the judges have held that this rule does not apply, and that the bargain of the parties is to be carried out. I think that exhausts the substance of the cases (p. 257). [The learned judge then discusses Astley v. Weldon at great length, and continues:] I have gone into that case rather minutely, because it is, I may say, the foundation of the subsequent cases on the subject. The next case, which is one of the greatest importance, is the case of Kemble v. Farren (infra, col. 2102), which has always been treated as a leading authority on the subject. I will not give a very positive opinion as to what the whole of that judgment means. I say so, because very eminent judges have taken very different views of the judgment, and therefore I suppose it is more ambiguous than it appears to me to be. But one thing is clear, that Tindal, C.J., in giving the opinion of the full Court, put an end, if I may say so, to any such doctrine as was shadowed forth by Heath, J. in the case I have just cited (p. 261). It appears to me that, rightly read, Kemble v. Farren does not go beyond Astley v. Weldon. I say so with some hesitation, because I know that there has been a difference between eminent judges as to whether or not the sentence I read about the breach of minute regulations (p. 148 of 6 Bing.) was not intended to apply to the whole of the judgment, and to say this, that where it is manifest that the damages must be minute, the same consideration applies as when the damages are ascertained at a certain sum (p. 262). There is a dictum of Coleridge, L.C.J. in Magee v. Lazell (infra, col. 2104). He says: "The general principle of law appears to me to be where a contract contains a variety of stipulations of different degrees of importance, and one large sum is stated at the end to be paid on breach of performance of any of them, that must be considered as a penalty." That is a dictum which is not supported by any decision, and it appears to me to be quite irreconcilable with principle. It is exactly opposed to what Tindal, C.J. says in Kemble v. Farren. The mere fact of the stipulations varying in importance cannot show that the parties did not fix a sum where the damage is not ascertainable; but I am bound to say that, though that is my opinion, and that I should have thought it was quite clear, I find that in the case of In re Newman, a decision of the Court of Appeal, that dictum is approved of. In the first place, James, L.J. says: "The authority of Kemble v. Farren cannot be considered as having been in any degree nibbled away by those cases before Lord Wensleydale, which have been referred to, and which it is said show that the principle of Kemble v. Farren is to be confined to a case; in which, amongst other stipulations, there was one stipulation for the payment of a sum of money. That was not the ratio decidendi of Kemble v. Farren, in which it was laid down in broad terms that, wherever there is a sum mentioned at the end of a contract as damages for the non-performance of any of a great number of stipulations, there it must be treated as a penalty." With the greatest respect to James, L.J., it appears to me that the very contrary was laid down in express terms. There is some mistake about it, that is all I can say. Then he refers to the decision of Heath, J., in Astley v. Weldon, which was overruled, and which was obviously, in my opinion, wrong. As regards Magee v. Lazell, I have this observation to make—it was only a dictum during the argument of Coleridge, L.C.J. I distrust dicta in all cases, and especially dicta during argument. I must say, however, that in In re Newman, Bramwell, L.J. intimated his agreement with it, although, as I have already said, there is not only no decision to be found laying down such a doctrine, but it is really opposed to several judgments, including the two I have cited. Bramwell, L.J. himself refers to two cases—Galsworthy v. Strutt (infra, col. 2102) and Athyns v. Kinnier (infra, col. 2103)—which are decisions in favour of liquidated damages where there was more than one stipulation, so that we have not only dicta opposed to dicta, but we have decisions opposed to decisions.—p. 264.

LINDLEY, L.J.—But when I come to look at the cases I cannot find a single case in which the larger sum has been treated as penalty where there has been no smaller sum ascertainable as the amount of damages. The nearest approach to it is the case of Betts v. Burch (infra, col. 2103), and I shall refer to that because it was decided by Bramwell, L.J., whose familiarity with the subject is unquestionable. In order to understand Betts v. Burch, it is necessary to observe that the larger sum there, the 50*l.*, would have been payable, not only in the event of the non-payment of the whole, but on non-payment of the last pound of the price, and the judgment of Martin, B. proceeds entirely upon this.—p. 275.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—The judgment in Reilly v. Jones went to a very great extent on the doctrine that the use of the words "liquidated damages" was conclusive. That doctrine has clearly been overruled by Kemble v. Farren (6 Bing. 141), which is a leading authority on the subject. The general principle of law appears to be that where the contract contains a variety of stipulations of different degrees of importance, and one large sum is stated at the end to be paid on breach of performance of any of them, that must be considered as a penalty.—p. 111.

KEATING, J.—With regard to the second question, I desire to add a few words as to what passed in this Court in the case of Lea v. Whitaker. In that case reference was made to the case of Reilly v. Jones, and reliance has been placed on that decision in the present case. Now, it was pointed out by my lord during the argument, that one of the grounds on which Reilly v. Jones was decided was, that no case had been decided, in which, when the parties had used the expression "liquidated damages," the Court had held that a penalty was intended and that the subsequent decisions have not treated that consideration as conclusive. I no doubt referred to Reilly v. Jones, in the case of Lea v. Whitaker without making the requisite qualification with respect to it; but the ground on which the remaining members of the Court proceeded, though they cited Reilly v. Jones, was that established by the subsequent cases. The facts of Lea v. Whitaker pointed very strongly to the conclusion that the damages were liquidated, for there the sum of 40*l.* had actually been deposited in the hands of a stakeholder to be paid over to the party against whom a breach of the agreement should be committed, and the words were "either party failing, &c., shall forfeit to the other his deposit money as and for liquidated damages." The Court held the 40*l.* to be liquidated damages, not merely because the words "liquidated damages" were used, but from the nature of the case with respect to the deposit of the money, it being difficult to see how the stakeholder could apportion the sum in accordance with the damage sustained from the breach of any particular stipulation. It seems to me, therefore, that the case of Lea v. Whitaker was rightly decided.—p. 116.

WILDE, C.J.—The next question is whether the 500*l.* mentioned in the agreement is to be considered as liquidated damages or not. That is a question which has been sometimes left to the jury. That course was adopted by Best, C.J. in Crisdee v. Bolton. But it is now clearly settled, that, whether the sum mentioned in an agreement to be paid for a breach is to be treated as a penalty or as liquidated and ascertained damages is a question of law, to be decided by the judge upon a consideration of the whole instrument.—p. 727.

LORD MANSFIELD.—It is impossible to support it, for it cannot be that a man should be obliged to take less than the liquidated sum, and the writ of error in that case was plainly brought by the defendant. Besides, the damage could never be taken advantage upon a writ of error. How could the quantum of damages found by the jury be the subject of a writ of error?—p. 2229.

FARWELL, J.—Now, in my opinion, the rule against perpetuity has no application whatever to personal contracts. If authority is necessary for that proposition, Witham v. Vane is a direct authority of the H. L.; and to my mind an even stronger case is that of Walsh v. Secretary of State for India. A stronger instance of the unlimited extent of personal liability could hardly be found; in that case the old East India Company entered into a contract, in 1770, with the first Lord Clive, to the effect—to put it shortly—that in the event of the company ceasing to be the possessors of the Bengal territories, they should repay to Lord Clive, his executors or administrators, several lacs of rupees, which had been transferred to them for certain particular purposes. The actual event did not happen till nearly a century later; and, as Lord Selborne pointed out in Witham v. Vane, the question of perpetuity was tentatively raised in the H. L.; but Lord Cairns, who was counsel in that case, refrained, with his usual discretion, from pressing it. I have said that the articles now under consideration are nothing more or less than a personal contract between Mr. Borland and the other shareholders in the company under sect. 16 of the Companies Act, 1862: Mr. Borland was one of the original shareholders, and he and his trustee in bankruptcy are bound by his own contract. . . . Mr. Borland cannot be heard to say that there is any repugnancy or perpetuity in the covenant he has entered into; and his trustee in bankruptcy stands in this respect in no better position than Mr. Borland himself. Counsel for the plaintiff attempted to apply the reasoning in Gomm's Case (post) to the present, and to argue that if the contract was merely personal it did not affect the trustee in bankruptcy, and that if it was an executory limitation it was void. But this is, in my opinion, unsound; the trustee is as much bound by these personal obligations of the bankrupt as the bankrupt himself, if he were not bankrupt, would be. p. 56.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—The only remaining question would be in point of form, whether, as in the case of the decree in Lincoln (Countess) v. Newcastle (Duke) the Court should take any notice of the occurrence which has taken place since the original hearing, namely, the death of the tenant for life bringing the tenant in tail in remainder into actual possession. I confess, my lords, that I do not think it necessary to do so. I think Foley v. Burnell is a decision expressly in point upon this subject, and that it is quite sufficient to enable us to read this clause as one in which the testator has used the expression "in possession," as meaning "entitled to a vested estate tail in the property," though it may be vested in remainder, and the party entitled may not be in actual possession, because in that case of Foley v. Burnell (and there never was a stronger case upon the subject), the L.C. relied upon the evidence of the intention to keep the real and personal estate together as long as possible, and yet held, that in reality that could not be effected under any possible mode of construction which could be arrived at under that will; and though there was a limitation to the father for life, and a direction that certain personal chattels (plate, I think, was the subject-matter) should go as heirlooms to the one who should take an estate tail in possession, it was held that the true effect of the expressions used in that will was, that an infant who took an absolute vested estate tail under the limitations of the will during the lifetime of the father, and then died during infancy (there being no provision there with respect to attaining the age of twenty-one), was entitled to the heirlooms, and those heirlooms did consequently vest in the infant, and in the event which happened, the father, being the administrator of the infant, became entitled to those heirlooms. No doubt the general intention of the will was to prevent it if possible; but, when fairly considered, there was no rule that the Court could devise that would effectuate the intention of the testator more completely, or, in fact, which would effectuate it at all. There were many other events which might have occurred which would have been equally embarrassing with reference to any construction to be given to the will. Therefore the Court held that what in reality the testator intended to do was this: he said: "When any person becomes actually entitled to the full benefit and complete interest in the real estate, the same person shall from that moment become entitled to the heirlooms," the distinction being not between the manual possession of the rents and profits and the holding of the estate in remainder, but between a vested interest and a contingent interest in the estate tail that was so limited. And in this case of Marshall v. Holloway (supra, col. 2108), Lord Eldon adverts in some measure to that distinction, and speaks of cases in which it has been held that the word "possession" is capable of a meaning which may not refer to the actual manual possession of the rents and profits. In fact, if that was contended for in the case of an outstanding lease, it would be difficult, or impossible, to hold that a person was entitled to possession in that sense, inasmuch as the tenants would have the possession, and the property would not be in that sense in possession of the person entitled, he would be in possession of the rents and profits, but not of the estate itself. But in Foley v. Burnell the difficulty really existed, and a construction had to be put in that case upon the whole intent and meaning of the will. And I think that that authority is strong enough to justify your lordships in arriving at the conclusion that the V.-C. was right in making the declaration even when the father was living, and holding that this gentleman was entitled to the absolute interest in the rents and profits of the personal estate under the events which have happened.—p. 32.

EADY, J.—Counsel for the plaintiffs . . . stated that, having regard to the expression "actual possession" contained in the will, he could not distinguish the present case from Scarsdale (Lord) v. Curzon and Angerstein, In re, and that as Sir Rose Price died in his mother's lifetime, and without ever having come into the actual possession of the estate, he could not contend that the specific chattels had become absolutely vested in him. . . . The general rule is that a gift of personalty to the persons for the time being entitled to real estate, so far as the rules of law and equity permit, vests absolutely not in a tenant for life of the real estate, but in the first tenant in tail at birth, whether he comes into possession or not—Foley v. Burnell (supra) and Scarsdale (Lord) v. Curzon. In Cox v. Sutton, Wood, V.-C. affirmed the general rule, in the clearest language, although in that case upon the special language of that will he was able to arrive (not without difficulty) at the conclusion that the personalty was given as a contingent gift to a person who should answer a particular description at a particular date. If there be a direction that the personalty is not to vest in a tenant in tail dying under twenty-one, this will prevent the personalty from vesting in a tenant in tail by purchase dying an infant—Christie v. Gosling (col. 2124), Harrington (Countess) v. Harrington (Earl) (col. 2125) and Martelli v. Holloway. And if the gift of personal estate be to the person actually seized at the death of the tenant for life or to the person seized of the actual freehold, which is defined as freehold in possession, or there are other clear words referring to actual possession, a tenant in tail who dies before coming into possession is excluded—Potts v. Potts (col. 2111). In this case Lord St. Leonards said, "If a plain intention is expressed that no person shall take the chattels absolutely, who does not live to become entitled to the possession of the real estate, the Court must execute the intention." Upon a careful consideration of the will and codicil I am unable to find any such intention expressed in the case before me, and as was said by Lord St. Leonards in Potts v. Potts, "it is firmly settled that the Court will not introduce in such cases the restrictions which conveyancers know how to introduce with apt words." . . . Indeed, the present case appears to me to be a stronger one in favour of the first tenant in tail taking an absolute interest than Martelli v. Holloway. There, the will contained a proviso that the personal estate should absolutely belong to such persons, &c., as should first attain twenty-one and become entitled to an estate tail in possession in the real estate, and it was held that a person had become absolutely entitled to the personal estate, although he had only a vested estate tail in the real estate in remainder expectant on his father's life estate.—p. 166.

KAY, J.—A case of Hogg v. Jones was much relied on, in which the limitation was "to the person who for the time being shall be in the actual possession and enjoyment of my freehold estates under the limitations of my will." A tenant in tail came into existence, whose estate was liable to be defeated by the birth of a son of a preceding tenant for life. It never was so defeated; but it did not come into possession during his lifetime, for he died before that life estate determined, leaving a son who would have been heir in tail in possession if his father had not barred the estate tail. Lord Romilly held this son entitled to the heirlooms, and he used language which certainly intimated an opinion that his father could not be, because his estate was defeasible, though it was never in fact defeated. It is enough to say that the decision, which was upon the effect of the words "actual possession and enjoyment," does not affect this case.—p. 109.

PEARSON, J.—I think the testatrix has, so to say, selected a persona designata to whom the personal estate is to go over, i.e. the person who, if the limitations of the will had been undisturbed by any disentailing deed, would have been the next in succession to take the real estates. I am confirmed in this view by the decision of the H. L. in Potts v. Potts (supra, col. 2111) and that of Lord Romilly in Hogg v. Jones. But I wish to guard myself from saying that I agree with everything which Lord Romilly said in the latter case. My decision, however, does not conflict with his.—p. 394.

LORD CRANWORTH.—The case is not distinguishable in principle from Gulliver v. Wickett. There, it is true, the devise over, if there had been a child, was on an event not too remote, and which, therefore, might have taken effect. In that respect it differs from the present case; but the Court held that the devise in the event which did happen, of there being no child, took effect not as an executory devise, but as a contingent remainder. I state that, although I know that a very high authority, Mr. Fearn (9th ed., p. 396), says the contrary; but, looking at the case, I can come to no other conclusion.—p. 549.

LINDLEY, M.R.—In Lowman, In re, a fund was limited in the events which happened to the first and other sons of the testator's niece Ellen, with remainder to the first and other sons of his niece Flora. Ellen was seventy and a spinster. Her possible son was the only person who stood in the way of Flora's son. The Court ordered the fund to be paid to Flora's second son, the eldest having died before he obtained a vested interest. The Court deprived no living person of a possible interest, nor has it ever done so that I know of.—p. 664.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree with the law as stated by the M.R., and I think that Jee v. Audley (post, col. 2121), when considered, is an authority for the propositions which he has laid down. Parfitt v. Hember (1867) L. R. 4 Eq. 443.

ROMILLY, M.R.—I think the doctrine of cy-près established by Humberston v. Humberston, is not a doctrine to be confined to cases where the testator has made a will of an executory character, and has imposed on the Court, or on persons surviving them, the duty of carrying his general intention into effect by framing a settlement for that purpose; but that this doctrine is a rule of construction, and that, when the Court finds that the object expressed by the testator is to give to A. an estate for life, to A.'s eldest son another estate for life, and to his eldest son, a third estate for life, and so on, the Court will carry that intention into effect as nearly as it can, by giving A. an estate for life, and to his eldest son, if unborn at the death of the testator, an estate in tail male, or, if he be alive at the death of the testator, an estate for life, with a remainder to his eldest son in tail male. It is obvious that if no tenant in tail executes a disentailing deed, this accurately effects the intention of the testator from generation after generation. It is true that the law, as incidental to an estate tail, allows any one of the tenants in tail in possession to defeat that intention by disentailing the estate, but this circumstance does not appear to me to affect the reasoning which entitles the Court to do what, as far as can be allowed, effects the intention of the testator. In the case I have supposed, A.'s son or grandson would, if I held that he was only to take a life estate, enjoy the estate for life, and then it would go to the testator's heir-at-law; but if the construction I support applies, he still enjoys the estate for life, and if he does not act to destroy the entail, the estate goes to his son in like manner; but even if he does any act to destroy the entail, the probability is that he re-settles the property in a manner more nearly resembling the wishes of the testator than any other construction would admit of. This seems to me to be the rule of construction adopted in Vanderplank v. King (post, col. 2135) and also in Montpeuny v. Dering (post, col. 2137). Though this rule of construction may be called technical, still it is a very reasonable one, as it prevents intestacy and executes the testator's intention as nearly as the law will allow.—p. 446.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—It seems to me that the case is really concluded by Tollemache v. Corentry (Earl). The words in that case were almost identical with the words in the present case. In that case a life estate was given first to the widow, and named only son of the testator. In the present case, a life estate is given to the named son of the testatrix, and in each case there is what I will call the heirloom clause: disposing of the heirlooms after the termination of the life estate. In Tollemache v. Corentry (Earl) there were alive at the date of the will and of the death of the testator a son who took a life estate, and living grandsons who might succeed to the title; and in the present case there were likewise a son, Rowland Clegg Hill, the third viscount, who took a life estate, and living grandsons who might succeed to the title; and in my judgment the H. L. did, in Tollemache v. Corentry (Earl), decide that the third Lord Vere—that is to say, the first taken under the description “such person as shall from time to time be Lord Vere”—took the heirlooms in that case absolutely. I know that this has been doubted by some of the judges who wrote opinions in Dungannon (Lord) v. Smith (post), col. 2120; but, for reasons which I will give presently, I am of opinion that the H. L. did so decide, and did not, as has been suggested, merely negative the title of the fourth Lord Vere (p. 419). . . . I do not quite understand why Crosswell, J., in Dungannon (Lord) v. Smith, says that the whole of the reasoning of Lord Brougham in Tollemache v. Corentry (Earl) shows that the executory bequest after the death of the second Lord Vere was void because it possibly might not vest in due time, and that the decision, therefore, must be taken to have been, not that the bequest was good as to the third Lord Vere. I see nothing in the reasoning of Lord Brougham inconsistent with his adoption of the argument of Sir C. Pepys and Mr. Preston; and Lord St. Leonards, who, in his Law of Property (1st ed.), p. 334, seems to have doubted this himself in Ker v. Dungannon (Lord), refers to the decision of the House in Tollemache v. Corentry (Earl) as having been to that effect. The decision in this sense seems to me to have been frequently recognised in later cases—see the decision of Mr. J. (afterwards L.J.) Fry, in Esmonth (Viscount) v. Praed (supra) and Johnston, In re (supra). . . . Counsel for the appellant argued that that case [Harrington v. Harrington (col. 2123)] showed that the words “so far as the rules of law and equity permit” would justify the Court in holding that no Lord Hill could claim the jewellery absolutely so long as there were persons living at the date of the death of the testatrix who could succeed to the title. But that case turned upon a proviso preventing the personalty from vesting absolutely in a tenant in tail unless he should attain twenty-one, and it was contended that the proviso had the effect of carrying on to those who came next in remainder after the taker on the determination of the life estate so exposing itself to be rendered void as aiming at perpetuity; but the House held that the proviso was an essential part of the gift, and therefore controlled by the words in the disposition clause, “so far as the rules of law and equity permit.” The effect of this was to limit the proviso so that it should only apply to tenants in tail who took by purchase, and consequently it could not be said that the proviso was void as aiming at perpetuity.—p. 420.

KINDERLEY, V.-C.—It does not appear to have been a case of an appointment under a power at all. Cox states it is a simple bequest of the testator's own property, but whether it was the case of an appointment or of a bequest, the limitation was held void, in Jee v. Audley, merely because the property was given to a class of persons who could not be, or at all events might not be, capable of being ascertained within the period of a life or lives in being at the death of the testator and twenty-one years after; in other words, it was void for remoteness.—p. 39.

A gift over on failure of issue would be void for remoteness as to mere personal property, but a gift over to children living would have been good if it had been to children living at the death of the testatrix, but as those persons might have had other children it was impossible to say that it meant children then living. The gift was held void for remoteness, and Lord Kenyon would not assume that the two aged persons might not have had other issue.—p. 475.

KAY, J.—Am I bound to give a construction to this will which I am sure was not the meaning of the testatrix, and which will also produce the unfortunate result that the gift to the children must fail, whether they attain twenty-five or not, because it is void for remoteness? If there be any doubt about the construction, as Lord Selborne said in Pearks v. Moseley (post, col. 2128), this is a matter which may be taken into consideration. The argument is this: a canon of construction it is said was laid down in Leake v. Robinson—that where there is no gift, except a direction to pay as the objects attain twenty-five, the attainment of the age is of the essence of the gift, which must be read as a bequest to those only of the class who attain the specified age. A number of other cases were cited in which this rule was applied (p. 718). . . . There is ample authority, as I have shown for treating this case as an exception to the rule in Leake v. Robinson, by reason of the subject being a separated fund and the gift over being on the death of the tenant for life without leaving issue.—p. 720.

FRY, J.—It will be observed in all those cases [Griffith v. Pownall (supra), Catlin v. Brown (supra) and Knapping v. Tomlinson] the shares taken by the persons ascertained within the period were incapable of increment by anything that might happen to the other shares. That appears to me the solid ground of distinction between those cases and the present case. In those cases, in effect, the share was finally and absolutely ascertained; it was neither capable of diminution or of enlargement after the period allowed by law. No doubt it is quite true that the distinction on which I am relying is a fine distinction between a gift of separate shares together with an interest in other shares which interest might be void for violating the rule against perpetuities, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, of a share whose smallest amount may be ascertained within the lawful period, but whose maximum amount can only be ascertained beyond that period—nevertheless it appears to me to be a distinction which the cases compel me to draw.—p. 700.

JAMES, L.J.—This case comes before us under these circumstances. There was a decision by Malins, V.-C., upon a clause of the will, and a subsequent decision [Hale v. Hale] by the M.R., upon the same clause, entirely controverting the decision of the V.-C. The V.-C.'s decision is reported in Moseley's Trusts, In re, and I feel bound to say that I entirely go along with the reasoning by which he arrived at his conclusion in that case. . . . But unfortunately for the appellant, unfortunately for my view of what I think the rule of law might have been, the very same point arose and had to be considered by the same V.-C. upon a will reported in a case of Smith v. Smith, which, with every possible wish to distinguish, I have found myself utterly unable to distinguish in any circumstances whatever from the will before us. The V.-C. having so expressed his view upon exactly the same principle, as is clearly shown in that case of Smith v. Smith, that conclusion, that view, and the principle upon which and the reasoning upon which he arrived at it were brought before the C. A. . . . and the C. A. did determine that the view of the V.-C. was not to be sustained, and did reverse that decision. The M.R. felt that the decision of Smith v. Smith was binding upon him, as it was; and it really is not less binding upon us. It is not for us to say that the decision is erroneous.—p. 558.

SELBORNE, L.C.—My lords, I find that the M.R. in Hale v. Hale, expressed an opinion upon the construction of this very will, with which I agree. He says (3 Ch. D., at p. 649): "As I read the gift, it was issue which should attain the age of twenty-one years. That was a part of the description of the issue, and, therefore, it was a mistake to say you could divide the number of shares into as many as there are children who are alive and children who died leaving issue. There is no gift to the issue as such—only to such as attain twenty-one." And he points out that Malins, V.-C., in Moseley's Trusts, In re, which has been so frequently mentioned in the argument, made that mistake in the reasons which he gave for his decision. It does appear to me, though there may be some expressions in Malins, V.-C.'s judgment in Moseley's Trusts, In re, which may perhaps go farther, that the view which is most calculated to reconcile all parts of that judgment is, that he thought you could properly treat the whole class as necessarily ascertained within twenty-one years from the death of the testator, and the ulterior condition, that the issue should attain twenty-one, as something superadded, and not forming part of the description of the issue. If so, I cannot agree with that view of Malins, V.-C.; I am obliged to agree with the view of the M.R. (p. 721). . . . It may be that if Jee v. Audley (supra, col. 2121), Leake v. Robinson (supra, col. 2122), and a long series of cases which have followed them, had never been decided, the Courts might have reasonably wished, if they could, to find some means of modifying the application of the rule of remoteness, so as to preserve as much as possible the intention of testators, and sacrifice only, if they could discover it, the real excess. But . . . I apprehend that now no authority less than that of the legislature can alter it.—p. 726.

LORD PENZANCE examined and approved of Smith v. Smith, and continued: It was there said [Dugannon (Lord) v. Smith (supra, col. 2120)], that where a testator has made a general bequest embracing a great number of possible objects, there is no authority for holding that a Court can so mould it as to say that it is divisible into two classes, one embracing the lawful, and the other the unlawful objects of his bounty. Therefore, your lordships have a decision in your own House distinctly adopting the principle of Leake v. Robinson.—p. 729.

STIRLING, J.—That case [Elliott v. Elliott] was decided in 1841 after argument, and though I have found no case since that time in which it has been followed, yet, upon the other hand, I have found none which can be said to be directly in conflict with it, or in which it has been dis-sented from, or even doubted. I also, upon examination of the cases, think that that case is not entirely isolated, for I find that Kerern v. Williams (supra) (which was approved of in Berkeley v. Swinburne (supra)), though it does not go the whole length of Elliott v. Elliott, tends in the same direction; therefore I think that, under the circumstances, if Elliott v. Elliott is to be set aside it is for the C. A. to do so, and not for me.—p. 354.

KEKEWICH, J.—In Wenmoth's Estate, In re, I understand Chitty, J.—although, no doubt, he treated the two rules, as to some extent they must be treated, as both being instances of fixing the period of distribution—was only dealing with the second rule—that is to say, the rule which fixes the period of distribution at the time when the first child becomes entitled to receive his share. It is that rule to which he refers, and it is that rule which he declines to extend to a case where only income is given. He does not deal with the other rule; and I take leave to doubt whether it occurred to him to consider at all, in that case, whether it would be right to alter the rule in any way as regards children taking at the death of the testator without any words with regard to attaining majority or anything of the kind, because they only took income, or for any other reason. I do not read his judgment as being at all directed to such a case as the one before me; and it seems to me that this case must depend upon the ordinary application of the ordinary rule, and that the children living at the testator's death, and no others, can take.—p. 150.

WICKENS, V.-C.—It seems to me, on consideration, that this case is undistinguishable in principle from that of Case v. Drosier. That case is one of the highest authority from the care with which it was argued, and the judges by whom it was decided. Now, it may be observed, that the construction assumed by both judges as the true construction of the limitation there, and by virtue of which it becomes applicable here, has been since established as the correct one by a decision of the H. L. in Baker v. Tucker [(1850) 3 H. L. C. 106; 14 Jur. 771.—H.L. (IR.).—p. 29.

MALINS, V.-C.—But . . . Avern v. Lloyd is apparently applicable. . . The marginal note is this: "Bequest of personal estate to unborn issue as tenants for life"—that is, to all the children of A., who, as yet, had no children, "as tenants for life"—to that there could be no objection,—“and to the executors, administrators and assigns of the survivor of the unborn issue.” The V.-C. held that that gave an absolute interest to the survivor. Now, that may be reconciled by regarding the words “executors, administrators and assigns” following a gift of life estate as words of limitation. If the V.-C. construed it thus, that it was a gift to all the children for life with a limitation to one of them absolutely, it may possibly be reconciled. But if the V.-C. intended to decide that the vesting of any gift whatever can be postponed till after the expiration of lives not yet in being, then, with every respect for the V.-C., I must differ from his opinion, because nothing can be more clearly settled (it was finally settled by Cudell v. Palmer (supra, col. 2108)), that you may postpone the vesting of the estate, either to a person in existence upon an event which may never happen or to a class of persons not yet in existence, but who may come into existence at any time within the life or lives in being and the period of twenty-one years in gross afterwards. But every gift which must not necessarily be ascertained within that period is void.—p. 476.

COTTON, L.J.—Avern v. Lloyd is very like the present case, and Stuart, V.-C. there said there was no question as to the validity of the limitation of the life estates in remainder to the unborn issue male and female of the testator's brothers John and Francis. The unborn issue clearly took life estates share and share alike; and as to the limitation to the executors, administrators, and assigns of the survivor of his brothers or their issue, male and female, who should happen to be such survivor, he said that considering that that limitation must take effect in the lifetime of the unborn issue to whom a good estate for life was given so as to give him an absolute estate in possession when he became survivor, it was not easy to see on what ground it could be considered too remote. . . . But that decision is not consistent with the decision in L. & S. W. Ry. v. Gomm (supra, col. 2109), and, in my opinion, it is not consistent with the law, and therefore the decision is wrong.—p. 385.

HALL, V.-C.—The authorities differ upon the questions raised in this case. The decision of Wood, V.-C. [in Wilson v. Wilson (supra, col. 2130)] I consider to be an authority in favour of the restraint on anticipation, certainly as to those persons who were in esse at the date of the settlement or death of the testator. . . . I consider the decision ought to be followed, unless there be authorities subsequently to it which I must follow. The authorities which are subsequent are Michael's Trusts, In re, before me, and Buckton v. Hay, before the M.R. The case before me is very shortly reported. The point that some of the children were actually born before the testator died does not appear to have been drawn to the attention of the Court, and it is only by referring to the dates that I can collect how the facts stood, and then only by looking at the dates of the marriages and the date of the death of the testator. He died in 1854, and the child who applied to the Court was married in 1853, therefore before the death of the testator. She was living at the testator's death, and at the time when his will came into operation. It seems to me that the decision in that case is unsatisfactory. In Buckton v. Hay the M.R. appears to have thought that such trusts ought to be considered as outside the rules against remoteness, and not affected by them.—p. 612.

JESSEL, M.R.—I must again express an opinion similar to that I have already expressed, and say that there [Hayes v. Hayes (supra, col. 2135)], the judge made a slip, as all judges do at times. . . .

It was there held that you cannot limit to an unborn child for life, unless the remainder, after his death, vests in interest at the same time. It never was law that the remainder must vest in interest at the same time. You might always give a life interest to an unborn person being a child of a person in being, and it did not matter what the gift over was after the death of such unborn child; it did not affect his interest.
There must be some mistake in that decision;
at all events it has never been followed. As I read the authorities, it has not only not been followed but the contrary construction has prevailed. Indeed the contrary has been assumed, sometimes without contest, in some reported cases, and, in order to show that that is so, I may refer to Gooch v. Gooch (col. 2126).
There a gift to children for their lives was assumed to include unborn children, and the bill only asked that the substitutionary gift over to their children might be declared void for remoteness. In Williams v. Teale the decision was exactly the reverse of that in Hayes v.
Hayes, and it is only necessary for me to read the following portion of Sir J. Wigram's judgment: "Upon another point I have also as strong an opinion as is consistent with the respect which is due to the decision of a very eminent judge, with which it may possibly be thought to conflict. I think that, under this will, notwithstanding the decision in Hayes v.
Hayes, the limitation of the testator's property to the unborn children of the testator's children is not void for remoteness only because it is a gift to persons who might be unborn at the death of the testator." It is plain to my mind that Sir J. Wigram's decision is in direct conflict with Sir J. Leach's. The next case—which was a case before the C. A.—is Gooding
v. Read. . . . Hayes v. Hayes does not appear to have been cited in that case; it is only mentioned in the reporter's note. Now I take it that both the cases to which I have referred are not to be reconciled with Hayes v. Hayes;
at all events they differ from it so far as to leave me at liberty now to say that Hayes v. Hayes is not sound law; indeed, it appears that Sir J.
Leach himself was dissatisfied with his decision.

HALL, V.-C.—The case is not like Monypenny v. There are no words here which will include that, nor any words which as a matter of construction can be said to express that, as there were in Doe v. Challis.—p. 526.

PEARSON, J.—It was urged that the decision in Evers v. Challis depended on the fact that it related to a contingent remainder. I cannot see that it did. For the purpose of considering whether the clause contained terms which were divisible, it was wholly immaterial whether there was a contingent remainder or not. And, whatever may have been the rule in former days, still less can it be of importance now, when the legislature has, by the Act of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 33, carefully provided against the failure of a contingent remainder by the failure of a prior particular estate, by enacting that whenever that is likely to happen the contingent remainder is to be treated as an executory devise.—p. 444.

LORD DAVEY.—But the same argument which has been pressed upon this House was addressed to the Court of C. P. more than a hundred years ago and overruled. In Proctor v. Bath and Wells (Bishop) (supra, col. 2116), decided in the year 1794, an advowson was devised to the first or other son of Thomas Proctor that should be bred a clergyman and be in holy orders, but in case Proctor should have no such son, to one Moore in fee. There being no particular estate to support the devise as a contingent remainder, it could take effect only as an executory devise. Proctor died without having had a son, and Moore thereupon claimed to present. It was argued that the limitations in the will were alternate: if Proctor should have a son in holy orders Moore was excluded, and if he had no son he could take. It was replied that in truth there was but one contingency on which the devise to Moore was limited, and the case was distinguished from a case of Longhead v. Phelps (supra, col. 2117) where two contingencies were expressed in the disjunctive, the first of which was good. The Court of C. P. was very clearly of opinion that the first devise to the son of Thomas Proctor was void from the uncertainty when such a son, if he had any, might take orders, and that the devise over to Moore, as it depended on the same event, was also void, for the words of the will would not admit of the contingency being divided. . . . The appellants, however, rely on another case in this House—of Evers v. Challis. On a superficial view of this case it appears to lend some support to their argument, but on a careful examination it will be found to have been decided on a totally different point, which has no application to the present case. The will in Evers v. Challis contained a very complicated series of devises of a freehold estate. It is sufficient for the present purpose to say that there was a devise to the testator's daughter Ann for life, with remainder to her children, if sons living to attain twenty-three, and if daughters living to attain twenty-one, with a gift over under which the appellant claimed, Ann having died childless. As an executory devise, the gift over was admittedly too remote, but it was argued that it took effect immediately on Ann's death as a contingent remainder. It is a familiar principle of English real property law that if a devise can take effect as a remainder it shall do so, and it was accordingly held in this House that the gift over, in the event which had happened, operated, and took effect as a contingent remainder, and the question of remoteness therefore did not affect it. That this was the point decided is clear from the opinion of the judges who were called in to assist this House, delivered by Wightman, J., as well as from the judgments delivered by the noble and learned lords who heard the case. Wightman, J. said: "No case or authority has been cited to show that where a devise over includes two contingencies, which are in their nature divisible, and one of which can operate as a remainder, they may not be divided though included in one expression: and our opinion does not at all conflict with the authority of Proctor v. Bath and Wells (Bishop) and Jee v. Audley (supra, col. 2121), in neither of which cases was it possible for the limitation over to operate as a remainder." Lord Cranworth said: "I think that the gift to the children of John and Sarah on the death of Ann without issue in 1847 took effect as a contingent remainder and not as an executory devise, and so was good: because when the particular estate determined, the contingency on which the remainder was to take effect had happened." And he supports his opinion by reference to a case of Gulliver v. Wickett (supra, col. 2115), which he discussed at some length. Lord Brougham said: "As to the cases, of which there are several, I need not go into them. One of them is Proctor v. Bath and Wells (Bishop). In that case there was no particular estate to support the contingent remainder, and it was clearly an executory devise." On these grounds this House reversed the decision of the Ex. Ch., and restored that of the Q. B. It is apparent that the authority of Proctor v. Bath and Wells (Bishop) is untouched by anything decided or said in Evers v. Challis. . . . Some minds may be disposed to sympathise with Sir W. Grant, when he says, in Leake v. Robinson (supra, col. 2122): "Perhaps it might have been as well if the Courts had originally held an executory devise transgressing the allowed limits to be void only for the excess, where the excess could, as in this case if it can, be clearly ascertained." But the law is what it is.—pp. 152, 153.

CHITTY, J.—On the part of the representatives of the husband it is argued that the trusts of the will and settlement of even date are to be incorporated with and read as part of the settlement of 1800, and that then, according to the decision of James, V.-C. in Powell's Trusts, In re, they are invalid, as contravening the rule against perpetuities; that is so, and the question, therefore, arises whether the decision in Powell's Trusts, In re is consistent with the course of authorities. James, V.-C. in that case decided that such a general testamentary power of appointment given to a married woman is not equivalent to ownership, so that as regards the rule against perpetuities the interest arising under the execution of the power by her will must be considered as created under the deed or will conferring the power. This decision is reported in the Law Journal reports, and also in the Weekly Reporter, but it is not reported in the Law Reports, but I am not entitled to say on that account that it is not properly reported, or an authority to which I need pay no attention. The case is reported, and I must attend to it and deal with it as best I can. I think the V.-C. in that case fell into an error. I can find no distinction between the case of capacity to alienate existing by reason of a general power and general capacity to alienate property. For the purposes of the power, the person exercising it, whether a man or a married woman, stands in exactly the same position with reference to the disposition purported to be made under the power. Mr. Butler and Lord St. Leonards both treat a general power of appointment as outside the rule against perpetuities. Lord St. Leonards in his work on Powers, says (8th ed. p. 394): "A general power is, in regard to the estates which may be created by force of it, tantamount to a limitation in fee, not merely because it enables the donee to limit a fee, which a particular power may also do, but because it enables him to give the fee to whom he pleases." He draws no distinction between a power exercisable by deed or will or by will only, and it appears to me to make no difference by what instrument the power is made exercisable. Lord St. Leonards also says (ib., p. 395): "Therefore, whatever estates may be created by a man seized in fee may equally be created under a general power of appointment; and the period for the commencement of the limitations in point of perpetuity, is the time of the execution of the power, and not of the creation of it." He goes on to quote Mr. Powell's note to Fearn's Executory Devises (p. 5) in favour of the contrary opinion, and in the result states that there appears to be no solid principle upon which the distinction taken by Mr. Powell can be supported, because the question whether the limitations are good does not depend on the fact that the donee of the power has also the fee in default of appointment, and that you can create the same estates and limitations under a general power of appointment as you can where you have the fee. There are remarks of other text-writers to the same effect, and I refer particularly to those of Mr. Butler, who says that this proposition is established "after a series of cases." Butler's Coke upon Littleton, 272 a. I think, therefore, there must be some error, some slip in the decision of James, V.-C. in Powell's Trusts, In re, and that the case was wrongly decided, and consequently that I must treat a feme covert as capable of creating the same limitations under a general power of appointment as she could under a will of her separate estate.—pp. 525—527.

NORTH, J.—I shall follow that decision [Rous v. Jackson], as the observations of Lord St. Leonards in his work on Powers (8th ed. p. 394) seem to be exactly in point and to bear out that judgment. I may add that, apart from that decision, and if I had to decide the question now for the first time, without the assistance of any previous decision on the point, I should decide as Chitty, J. did, and not as was decided in Powell's Trusts, In re.—p. 202.

CHATTERTON, V.-C.—In the conflict between Powell's Trusts, In re, and *Rous v. I have carefully considered Rous v. Jackson and Flower, In re, and my opinion entirely coincides with those of Chitty, J. and North, J. And I say this at the peril of, in their company, differing from such an eminent judge as James, V.-C.—p. 536.

STIRLING, J.—It has been decided that the rule against perpetuities has no application to the transfer in a certain event of property from one charity to another: Christ's Hospital v.

Grainger and Tyler, In re, Tyler v. Tyler. The principle of those decisions, however, does not extend, in my opinion, to cases where—first, an immediate gift in favour of private individuals is followed by an executory gift in favour of charity: or, secondly, an immediate gift in favour of charity is followed by an executory gift in favour of private individuals. Of the former class of cases Selborne, L.C., giving the judgment of the C. A. in Chamberlayne v. Brockett [(1872) 42 L. J. Ch. 368; L. R. 8 Ch. 206. See "CHARITY," vol. i., col. 327], says: "If the gift in trust for charity is itself conditional upon a future and uncertain event, it is subject, in our judgment, to the same rules and principles as any other estate depending for its coming into existence upon a condition precedent. If the condition is never fulfilled, the estate never arises; if it is so remote and indefinite as to transgress the limits of time prescribed by the rules of law against perpetuities, the gift fails ab initio." The second class of cases does not seem to have fallen under the consideration of any Court in this country; but the Supreme Court of Massachusetts has in Brattle Square Church v. Grant, 3 Gray 142, and Theological Education Society v. Att.-Gen., 21 Lathrop. 285, held that the rule against perpetuities applies to them. For the knowledge of these decisions I am indebted to the very learned and able treatise of Professor J. C. Gray on the Rule against Perpetuities, p. 363, sect. 593, to which I was referred in argument. On the other hand, as property may be given to a charity in perpetuity, it may be given for a shorter period, however long; and the interest undisposed of, even if it cannot be the subject of a direct executory gift, may be left to devolve as the law prescribes. Of this an example is to be found in Randell, In re, Randell v. Dixon.—p. 683.

 COLLINS, L.J.—It no doubt does appear that Mr. Baron Watson, in delivering the judgment of the Ex. Ch. [in the above case], did suggest that, even if a judgment had been obtained against the guardians, the Court could not have granted a mandamus to compel the making of a rate to satisfy it, because such a rate would have been illegal. But it is obvious that that observation is only a dictum, because in that case no judgment had been obtained.—p. 567.
